PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 127) to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2664. An act for the relief of Jesse Goodin;

S. 2666. An act for the relief of Ed Thomas and Pauline Thomas;

H. R. 6313. An act authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to grant a right of way for a public highway to the county of Skagit, Wash.;

H. R. 7052. An act for the relief of G. C. Caldwell;

H. R. 9859. An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11265. An act to authorize the maintenance of a bridge constructed across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 11407. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920;

H. R. 11646. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River near Steubenville, Ohio;

S. J. Res. 7. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate depositaries of public moneys in foreign countries and in the Territories and insular possessions of the United States;

S. J. Res. 204. Joint resolution to authorize the loan by the Secretary of War to the commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans of cots for the use of the members of the United Confederate Veterans during the sessions of the national encampment of the United Confederate Veterans at Richmond, Va., from June 19 to 22, 1922; and

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Quartermaster General of the Army, transmitting a list of American soldier dead returned from overseas to be reinterred in the Arlington National Cemetery, Thursday, June 15, 1922, which was ordered to lie on the table for the information of Senators.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Social Hygiene Society, the Social Hygiene Council, the executive board of the League of Women Voters, and the College Women's Club, all of the District of Columbia, protesting against the selection of a site at Blue Plains for the location of an institution for the feeble-minded and suggesting that some other site having the advantage of being sufficiently isolated and extensive be chosen rather than Blue Plains, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kansas City, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LENROOT presented the memorial of Mrs. M. E. Rotier, corresponding secretary Wisconsin Federation of Women's Clubs, of Milwaukee, Wis., remonstrating against the food, tableware, and women's-wear schedules in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROPOSED DUTY ON CASEIN.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD and have referred to the Committee on Finance a communication from the American Paper & Pulp Association protesting against the tariff duty fixed on casein, and also a communication from the Robert Gair Co. protesting against the same duty and indicating the effect that duty will have on the paper trade. The American Paper & Pulp Association assert that the duty in the pending bill means a direct increase in cost of about $1,000,000 a year to the consumers of coated paper.

There being no objection, the communications were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN PAPER PULP ASSOCIATION,
New York, June 7, 1922.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The proposed tariff of 4 cents per pound, H. R. 7456, Schedule 1, paragraph 17a, on casein means a direct increase in cost of about $1,000,000 a year to the American consumers of coated paper, if, in fact, the coated paper industry can continue to exist if its main source of supply of this indispensable material is so taxed as to divert two-thirds of the total supply to European competitors.

It is only a matter of such tremendous importance to an industry representing a capital investment of $75,000,000 that leads this committee of five, authorized representatives of the entire coated-paper industry of the United States to trespass on your courtesy at a time when so many other matters are demanding your attention.

In view of the importance of this question to both the consumer and the producer of coated paper, we are inclosing for your careful consideration a copy of the brief which has been filed with the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate.

We hope you can see from this presentation of the facts that it is proper to cast your vote against this proposed duty.

Yours very truly,

MARTIN CANTINE, Chairman,
CHARLES A. GORDON,
CHARLES F. SHIRLEY,
WALTER D. RANDALL,
HUGH P. BAKER,
Committee of Coated Paper Manufacturers.

NEW YORK, June 10, 1922.

Hon. D. I. WALSH,
Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

(H. R. 7456.) Schedule 1, paragraph 17a. Casein or lactarene, 4 cents per pound.

The amendment referred to above was adopted by the Committee of the Whole on May 23, 1922, and purports to fix a duty of 4 cents per pound on imported casein.

Casein is a dairy by-product, indispensable to the surfacing of paper. Coated papers, for the manufacture of which casein is the principal medium, are extensively used in educational books, periodicals, and scientific, also commercial catalogues wherein photographs are reproduced by a printing process. In both æsthetic and practical printing or lithography clay-coated paper produced with the assistance of casein is the only surface upon which full justice to the workman's skill and art treatment can be preserved. And upon box boards, of which folding cartons are manufactured for the protection and identification of all forms of foods and necessities, it is extensively used to impart a cleanly printing surface.

The quantity of casein produced in the United States is insufficient. The domestic output is considerably less than the domestic need, and this shortage is made up by importations from Holland and the inferior substance from the Argentine. Four cents per pound added to the import price will encourage an advance in the American market for domestic casein, and as there is no industry to protect the proposed tariff will be retroactive upon the adopted policy of the country to abate high prices and bring costs down. This 4 cents per pound on casein will prompt and stimulate higher prices for a raw necessity, which is not abundant enough to supply the demand and which will fall directly upon the box board and paper industries, as it is there that 90 per cent of all domestic and imported casein is consumed.

Since this tariff is, to our minds, opposed to the common interests of the country and is altogether unjust to the industries mentioned, we ask for your close consideration of the amendment quoted above and protection against its adoption.

Yours very truly,

ROBERT GAIR CO.,
GEO. W. GAIR, President.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3275. A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil and Mexican Wars and to certain widows, former widows, minor children, and helpless children of said soldiers and sailors, and to widows of the War of 1812 (Rept. No. 770); and

H. R. 8569. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors (Rept. No. 771).

Mr. RAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6966) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Fred H. Gallup major of Field Artillery in the United States Army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 772) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3707) for the relief of Hazel E. Simms (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3708) granting a pension to James J. Holland; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 3709) to provide for an examination and report on the condition and feasibility of a reclamation project at Hope, Eddy County, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

CIVILIAN INSTRUCTORS AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand it is the intention of the majority side to take up the naval appropriation bill to-morrow. As Senators know, I have on one or two occasions referred to the instructors at the Naval Academy who have been taken from civil life. The other day I had a conference with Admiral Wilson, the Superintendent of the Naval Academy. It was an informal exchange of views, and I asked him to reduce to writing any statement which he desired to make. I have his letter before me. I shall not take the time of the Senate to have it read, but I think it may be of interest to Senators in view of the expectation that the naval appropriation bill will be taken up for consideration to-morrow. I therefore ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY,
Annapolis, Md., 10 June, 1922.

MY DEAR SENATOR POMERENE: Referring to our conversation of last Wednesday (7 June, 1922), in which you asked me to comment on your remarks in the Senate as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 2 June, 1922, I am pleased to note that you take an intense interest in the proper training of the midshipmen, and you state that the methods of instruction in the two service academies should be equal to those which prevail in the great universities of the country. I can assure you that we are in accord as to this, and it is our aim at the Naval Academy to do everything we can to maintain high standards in methods of instruction, and because of your interest in this matter I am taking it for granted that you would like to be informed a little more fully of the steps being taken to accomplish this purpose.

There has been in some quarters a misunderstanding of my attitude toward civilian instructors at the Naval Academy. What I advocate is not elimination of civilian instructors from the Naval Academy but simply a return to the status which existed before the World War. You will appreciate that war demands made inroads on the officers detailed to the Naval Academy. At the same time the more instructors were needed because the number of midshipmen was more than doubled. This caused somewhat of an upheaval in the teaching staff. Large numbers of civilian instructors were employed in lieu of officers not then obtainable, due to the needs of the service afloat. Having in view an economic administration of the Naval Academy combined with efficiency, a careful investigation has convinced me that it is to the best interests of the Government that the ratio of civilian instructors to naval officers be reduced to what it was before the war. The official Board of Visitors appointed by the President, Vice President, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, in their report of 27 April, 1922, also recommended as follows:

"It is the opinion of the board that the ratio of civilian instructors to officer instructors should be that existing prior to the war. In arriving at this conclusion the board recognizes the great value of civilian instructors, particularly as a means of keeping the curriculum modern and in harmony with the growth of educational thought. It is highly important, however, that midshipmen be brought in contact early in the course with officers who have seen real service. Such teachers bring an inspiration that is most important, and close personal contact with experienced officers throughout the course is, in the opinion of the board, most essential. Officer instructors, however, should be carefully selected. All men can not teach successfully, and the officer instructors should be selected as much for teaching fitness as for other qualities."

The value of civilian instructors at the Naval Academy is keenly appreciated. It is most important to have the advice and assistance of expert teachers in mathematics, English, modern languages, physics, chemistry, and electricity, but what we need at present is quality rather than quantity. At the same time I do not wish to work undue hardship on civilian instructors, and therefore reductions will be made step by step. As the classes get smaller there will be reductions in the teaching staff, both civilians and officers, until the Naval Academy is once more on its normal peace-time footing.

In the history of the Naval Academy from the date of its foundation the ratio of civilian instructors to officer instructors has varied from one extreme to the other. As a result of these years of experience, the ratio that existed before the war was finally settled upon as giving best results.

Long experience has demonstrated that many naval officers make excellent teachers. The work of a naval officer afloat involves study to keep up with advances in naval science. An officer's life work is essentially leadership of men with the consequent necessity for continuous instruction and teaching of subordinates in handling men, operation of guns and machinery, and numerous drills. Consequently all naval officers are to a degree students and teachers. Of course, some are better than others. This applies both to civilian teachers and to officers. The civilian teacher may be a more finished scholar, but, on the other hand, the naval officer has an advantage in that midshipmen listen carefully to what he tells them, because they know that his teaching is backed by experience with ships and men. What we are striving for is the best possible combination of high-grade civilian teachers and high-grade officer teachers working together in a spirit of cooperation.

The "Hearings before Subcommittee of House Committee on Appropriations" on "Navy Department appropriation bill, 1913," pages 610, 611, 612, 613, and 614, contains statements made by me in more detail.

Thanking you for your kind consideration,

Very sincerely,

HENRY B. WILSON,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy, Superintendent.

HON. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHIPPS obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just long enough for me to state that when the consideration of the pending bill is resumed I shall ask the Senate to proceed with paragraph 408, shingles.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President. I ask that that paragraph may go over until any time the chairman desires next week. On account of arrangements made heretofore I was not expecting it to come up to-day and have made no preparation for it. I shall be engaged in a conference on the Army appropriation bill this afternoon and probably to-morrow. So, if it will not discommode the Senator too much, I hope that the paragraph may go over until any time he may desire next week.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we can accommodate the Senator. I will ask, therefore, that the paragraph 408 may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paragraph will be passed over.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to House bill 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I had no objection to taking up the matter, but as there may be Senators who are not present who wish to be informed on the question, I suggest the absence of a quorum that absent Senators may be here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Calder	Culberson	Edge
Borah	Cameron	Curtis	Ernst
Brandegee	Capper	Dial	Fernald
Broussard	Caraway	Dillingham	Gerry

Hale	McCumber	Pepper	Swanson
Harreld	McKinley	Phipps	Underwood
Harris	McNary	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Harrison	Nelson	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Johnson	Newberry	Rawson	Walsh, Mont.
Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
Kellogg	Norbeck	Simmons	Williams
Kendrick	Norris	Smoot	Willis
Ladd	Oddie	Spencer
Keyes	Overman	Sterling
McCormick	Owen	Sutherland

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is necessarily absent; that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on account of illness; and that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent on official business.

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is detained by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PHIPPS. The District of Columbia appropriation bill, House bill 10101, has received the approval of both Houses, with the exception of the first amendment of the Senate, the fiscal feature of the bill, which was amended by the House, and the House amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I was authorized by that committee to report it back with a slight amendment, which will be found on page 3 of the amendment adopted by the House, and which is to insert, after the word "discretion," in line 10 of the House text:

To any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate.

It is simply a matter of precaution to have the language put in such form that it can not be misunderstood or misconstrued. I ask that the amendment may be approved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the amendment of the House, and read to line 14, page 2, as follows:

That annually from and after July 1, 1922, 60 per cent of such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may appropriate for shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation and privileges, and the remaining 40 per cent by the United States, excepting such items of expense as Congress may direct shall be paid on another basis; and that in order that the District of Columbia may be able annually to comply with the provisions hereof, and also in order that the said District may be put upon a cash basis as to payment of expenses, there hereby is levied for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, a tax at such rate on the full value, and no less, of all real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia as will, when added to the revenues derived from privileges and from the tax on franchises, corporations, and public utilities, as fixed by law, and also from the tax, which hereby is levied, on such intangible personal property as is subject to taxation in the District of Columbia, at the rate of five-tenths of 1 per cent on the full market value thereof, produce money enough to pay such annual expenses as may be imposed on the District of Columbia by Congress, and in addition to such annual expenses a surplus fund sufficient to enable the District of Columbia to get upon a cash-paying basis by the end of the fiscal year 1927.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, at this point I wish to say that it was desired by various civic organizations of the District that their comments and their objections to the proposed changes be heard, and the conferees have been in touch with those organizations through their accredited representatives. They have strongly urged that the provision for the change in tax-paying dates proposed in the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], Senate bill 3565, and which has had the approval of the Committee on the District of Columbia, be incorporated in this amendment. The language follows, and I ask the Secretary to read the proposed amendment to the House amendment.

The READING CLERK. Following the numerals "1927," in line 14, it is proposed to insert the following:

and that beginning with July 1, 1922, and annually thereafter, one-half of the tax levied upon taxable real property in the District of Columbia shall become due and payable on the 1st day of November of each year and the other half of such tax shall become due and payable on the 1st day of May of each year; and if one-half of such tax shall not be paid before the 1st day of December of each year, said installment shall thereupon be in arrears and delinquent; and there shall then be added, to be collected with such tax, a penalty of 1 per cent upon the amount thereof, and a like penalty on the 1st day of each succeeding month until payment of said installment and penalty; and if said installment shall not be paid before the 1st day of June of each year, together with the one-half of said original tax due on the 1st day of May, a like penalty beginning with the 1st day of June shall then be added on said last one-half of such tax; and the whole together shall constitute the delinquent tax, to be dealt with and collected in the manner now provided by law; and that hereafter the board of personal tax appeals, consisting of the assessor, as chairman ex officio, together with the three members of the board of real estate assessors and the three members of the board of personal tax appraisers, shall constitute the board of personal tax appeals, which shall convene on the first Monday in January and remain in session until the second Monday in February of each year for the hearing of appeals from assessments on personal property; and the same members shall also constitute the board of equalization and review of real estate assessments.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if it is in order, I move that the amendment to the amendment be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the House amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the House amendment was continued to line 10, page 3.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 10, after the word "discretion," to insert "to any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate," so as to read, after line 14, page 2:

and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix such rate of taxation as will, when applied to the aforesaid property in accordance with the levies and values hereinbefore mentioned, produce the said sums of money; and that until July 1, 1927, the Treasury Department may continue to make advancements toward the payment of the expenses of the District of Columbia as has been done during preceding years, but after June 30, 1927, it shall be unlawful for any money to be so advanced or for any money whatever to be paid out of the Treasury for District purposes, unless the District, at the time of such payment, has to its credit in the Treasury money enough to pay the full per cent required of it; and that for the purpose of defraying such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may from time to time appropriate for, there hereby is levied for each and every fiscal year succeeding that ending June 30, 1927, a tax at such rate on the aforesaid property subject to taxation in the District (the rate fixed herein on intangible personal property not to be made less but which may be increased by the commissioners in their discretion to any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate) as will, when added to the other taxes and revenues of the District, produce money enough to enable the District to pay promptly and in full all sums directed by Congress to be paid by the District, and for which appropriation has been duly made; and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix annually such rate of taxation as will, when applied as aforesaid, produce the money needed to defray the share of the expenses of the District during the year for which the rate is fixed; and that the Commissioners of the District shall, in accordance with existing law, cause all such taxes and revenues to be promptly collected and, when collected, to be daily deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the District for the purposes herein set out; and that on July 1, 1922, the Treasury Department shall open, and thereafter accurately keep, an account showing all receipts and disbursements relative to the revenues and expenditures of the District of Columbia, and shall also show the sources of the revenue, the purpose of expenditure, and the appropriation under which the expenditure is made; and that from and after June 30, 1922, any and all revenue derived from property not owned wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, as between the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be the property of the United States; and that after June 30, 1922, where the United States is the owner of ground or the holder thereof in trust for the public, upon which improvements have been made at the joint expense of the United States and the District of Columbia, the revenues therefrom shall first be used to pay the United States 3 per cent of the full value of the ground as a ground rent, and the remainder shall be divided between them in the same proportion that each contributed to said improvements, and for such purposes the assessor for the District of Columbia shall fix the full value of the ground after he has first made oath that he will fairly and impartially appraise the same; and that after June 30, 1922, any revenue derived from any activity or source whatever, including motor-vehicle licenses, not otherwise herein disposed of, which activity or source of revenue is appropriated for by both the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be divided between the two in the same proportion that each has contributed thereto; and that if, for any fiscal year after June 30, 1927, the District of Columbia should raise and deposit in the Treasury to its credit, as herein provided, more money derived from taxation, privileges, and other sources authorized herein than may be necessary for the purposes herein set out, such excess shall be available the succeeding year, in the discretion of the commissioners, either for the purpose of meeting the expense chargeable to the District of Columbia and/or for the further purpose of enabling the commissioners to fix a lower rate of taxation for the year following the one in which said excess accrued than they might otherwise be able to do; and that after June 30, 1922, the agencies through which the District of Columbia collects its revenues derived from taxation shall also collect for the United States any revenues which by this act become the sole property of the United States, and said revenues shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as "Miscellaneous Receipts," but the revenues from the property known as Center Market shall not be so collected; and that hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not be restricted in submitting to the Bureau of the Budget their estimates of the needs of the District, but they shall, as near as may be, bring them within the probable aggregate of the fixed proportionate appropriations to be paid by the United States and the District of Columbia.

That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with any provision of this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict but no further.

That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, hereby is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia and the advances from the Federal Treasury herein permitted, namely:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to the House amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the House amendment having been concluded,

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has an amendment which he desires to offer to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to come in on page 4, line 5, after the word "made." I move to insert the provision which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, line 5, after the word "made," it is proposed to insert:

and that a joint committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is hereby created and authorized and directed to ascertain and determine what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the United States from the District of Columbia, or what, if any, indebtedness there may be owing to the District of Columbia from the United States, growing out of transactions or relations existing between them since the passage of the organic act of 1878; and that said committee in reaching a conclusion shall consider not only legal but equitable claims and obligations and shall report its conclusions and recommendations to each House of Congress on or before the first Monday in January, 1923; and that said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic, clerical, and expert assistance as may be necessary, and to pay for the same upon vouchers signed by the chairman, one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; and that said committee is authorized and directed to avail itself of the services of the Bureau of Efficiency and such expert and legal help of the Treasury Department and of the District of Columbia as it may deem practicable so to do.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to say that the amendment to the amendment just read is the same as the joint resolution known as the Jones resolution, which has been adopted by the Senate and which has been favorably reported in the other House. It has not, however, yet been acted on by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. If this is a conference report, the amendment is not in order. If the item was in dispute and the action taken represents the agreement of the conferees of the two Houses, that is one matter; but if it is an amendment to a conference report, it is not in order at all.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Utah will recall that a great many items which were in dispute have been adjusted, but this particular item was not embodied in the conference report, as it was thought a point of order would probably lie against it, but we are trying to adjust the whole matter and hoped that the whole controversy might be settled by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am told that the action proposed represents an agreement between the conferees of the two Houses in reference to the subject; and that, of course, I think might be in order; but an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate to a conference report would not be in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that is not the situation. The situation is that the House of Representatives concurred in a Senate amendment with an amendment. It is that amendment of the House which is before the Senate, and to that amendment an amendment is now offered. The amendment before the Senate is not a part of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Have the conferees on the part of the two Houses agreed to it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it is not a part of the conference report. The House concurred in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. This, then, is not an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. I believe that amendment numbered 1 as amended is now in form for adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the House amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to occupy but a moment to congratulate the conferees upon the part of the Senate on the very able and fair manner in which they have handled this whole question. I objected to the amendment as it came from the other House for the reason that I thought it included so many matters which were in dispute that it should go to a committee, and that there should be a hearing upon the part of the committee of those citizens in the District who might desire to be heard. The conferees, however, took another course. They have heard every citizen who desired to be heard; they have been fair, and have performed a splendid work. I am very glad the amendment has been agreed to, and I think it will be satisfactory to all concerned.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11827) granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. We took a recess on yesterday evening while that Senator was in the midst of his address. I desire to ask the Senator, if he wishes, to proceed now.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am now prepared to proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I suggest that the Senator proceed now, and after he has concluded, then I shall ask to take up paragraph 302, relative to ferrotungsten alloys.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I desire to complete the argument which I began yesterday. At this stage I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the industrial alcohol manufacturers who use blackstrap molasses made a request that blackstrap molasses be placed on the free list?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not. I am not certain, for I can not remember all the testimony; but, as I recall, the main request came from the agricultural users.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That was my understanding; that those who manufacture industrial alcohol have made no request that blackstrap molasses be put on the free list.

In order, Mr. President, to indicate the interest those engaged in the production of industrial alcohol have in having blackstrap molasses placed on the free list, I desire to set forth the amount of blackstrap molasses consumed by the industrial alcohol manufacturers of the United States, and in view of the fact that they did not oppose a duty on molasses, show how unfair and inequitable the result of the action of the committee will be to the manufacturers of blackstrap molasses in the United States. I shall now refer to a pamphlet published by Mr. Burnell R. Tunison, of the United States Industrial Alcohol Co., of New York City, on the subject of industrial alcohol. I may say that the pamphlet was published in 1920. On page 411 there is a table which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I wish now to comment briefly on the table. As will be observed it shows, by States, the grain and other materials used in the production of distilled spirits for the year ended June 30, 1919. I shall only give the round numbers.

The table shows that of industrial alcohol made of molasses, California produced 11,000,000 gallons; the District of Columbia, 917,000 gallons; Illinois, 12,000,000 plus; Kentucky, 417,000 gallons plus; Louisiana, 27,000,000 gallons plus; Maryland, 21,000,000 gallons plus; Massachusetts, 7,000,000 gallons plus; Montana, 154,000 gallons plus; New York, 33,000,000 gallons plus; Pennsylvania, 7,900,000 gallons; making a total of blackstrap molasses consumed in the manufacture of industrial alcohol of 123,498,693 gallons.

Now, I wish to refer the Senate to a document published by the Agricultural Department, entitled "Production of Principal Feeds," referred to also as commercial feeds. On page 60 of that pamphlet there are given in detail for the year 1919 the total importations of blackstrap molasses. My idea in referring to that is to account for the difference between the number of gallons used for industrial alcohol and the total of the domestic production plus the importations. By the way, I am referring only to the cane blackstrap molasses and not to the beet blackstrap molasses; but my idea is to show and account for the difference between the cane blackstrap molasses converted into industrial alcohol and the total importations plus the domestic production, so as to show what the difference available for other purposes amounts to.

I find in this pamphlet, issued by the Agricultural Department, called "Commercial Feeds," on page 60, that in 1919 the importations from Porto Rico were 15,554,493 gallons; the importations from Hawaii were 9,882,567 gallons; the importations from Cuba were 110,244,781 gallons. I have added these importations, and they make a total of importations of 141,683,841 gallons.

Granting that all of the 16,000,000 gallons produced in the United States—and I may say that 99.9 per cent of it was produced in Louisiana, amounting to more than 16,000,000 gallons—may have been thrown into this class of imported blackstrap molasses, we get the following result: Adding the 16,000,000 to the total importations of 141,000,000 plus, we get a total of 157,63,841 gallons, which was the total available for all purposes in the United States; and deducting that used in the manufacture of alcohol from the total available blackstrap molasses we get a balance of 34,185,148 gallons used for feed and adulterants in the United States for the year 1919.

Mr. President, the question which I have just propounded to the chairman of the committee clearly demonstrates my object. The industrial alcohol people have never asked that blackstrap molasses be put on the free list. The industrial alcohol people have been satisfied with the present duty that is on blackstrap molasses. The industrial alcohol people have never protested against the Payne-Aldrich tariff rates on blackstrap molasses; and still, under these figures, Mr. President, we find that out of 157,683,841 gallons available for all purposes, the industrial alcohol people consume 123,498,693 gallons, and still they are not asking that blackstrap be put on the free list.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to ask the Senator if he has the figures showing the consumption of blackstrap molasses by the alfalfa feed mills?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have that information and will give it presently.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to have it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But here are documents that are authentic, that are backed with authority, that show that out of 157,683,841 gallons there was a little over 34,000,000 gallons used for all purposes outside of the manufacture of industrial alcohol, and still the people using nearly all the blackstrap molasses and converting it into alcohol are not asking a reduction of the House rate. They never protested the rate which the people from my State have demanded of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. They never appeared there; and still a few people who believe that the price of feedstuffs to the dairyman and to the feeder might be increased have been fooled into that attitude—as I demonstrated yesterday and propose to go over again to-day—have been used as cat's-paws to destroy an industry which is competitive, and they are practicing fraud and deception by palming off this as Louisiana molasses after having filtered it, which is merely a physical process.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we find—and I have the facts here—that the people who have started this propaganda are the Penick & Ford Co. (Ltd.), which is owned and operated by the American Sugar Trust, and which has two objects in view. One is to profit by the reputation which we cane growers in Louisiana have built, and there is nobody on this floor but that remembers in his boyhood that he bought Louisiana molasses, and that was a product that was expensive to make, and these people want to have free blackstrap molasses to refine or to filter and then palm it off on the reputation which the domestic industry has established as Louisiana molasses. The other is—and that is the vital thing in which the Senator from Colorado is as vitally interested as the people of Louisiana—that these people are trying to destroy the domestic sugar industry, and wherever they can cut one-quarter of a cent of profit per gallon of by-product of molasses they revel in it.

I am surprised that any Senator representing any State that produces sugar and has a by-product to dispose of should ever espouse the cause of the enemy, who are trying to work both ways, using the dairyman against the domestic cane-sugar producer and using, on the other hand, the argument which they advance for the purpose of reducing a duty and then indirectly destroying the production of sugar in the United States.

I am absolutely solid on my foundation when I make this statement. I know what I am talking about; and what do they present to the dairymen or to the feeders? I shall now dwell on the question which the Senator from Colorado has asked me. Are not the dairy people asking us to protect their butter? And if we are to protect their butter against the importations of foreign butter, why is it not right to grant us one-fourth of a cent a gallon on a by-product of a domestic industry? I am willing to vote for a duty on butter, but I resent the narrow-minded view of the dairyman who wants 10 cents a pound protection on his butter and wants to deny the American sugar producers of this country one-fourth cent per gallon on the blackstrap molasses, which, if analyzed—and I think at one time the Senator challenged the figures which I produced, and I have another set to produce—means 6 cents a ton on feed to the dairyman if he uses the cheaper grades of blackstrap molasses, and if he uses the highest grades in the manufacture of feedstuffs it means a difference of only 34 cents per ton of feed which he consumes. What right has he to ask you and to ask me to vote for a duty on butter and then want to expose us and to subject us to competition with Cuban blackstrap molasses? And if you once admit that that is the correct argument, what becomes of your argument when you stand up here and ask for a duty of $1.60 per ton on sugar? What is the difference? Why does the committee allow $1.60 per hundred pounds on Cuban sugar, and why do some of us now claim 2 cents or $2 per 100 pounds? Why do we ask $2, or why has the committee agreed to $1.60 per 100 pounds on sugar unless it be to put us on a parity as to American cost of production with the Cuban cost of production? If that applies to sugar, is not the blackstrap molasses produced by the same labor, in the same factories, and under the same conditions in competition with the same American labor, the same American production, in the same factories, and under the same conditions? You can not admit one and deny the other unless you destroy your position on the first.

I think the dairymen have reversed their attitude. I know that the grain people have. I demonstrated that yesterday, and I propose to do it again, with additional proofs, to show that it is the most narrow-minded, it is the most unintelligent conclusion that any set of men could ever arrive at, that they should want to permit the industrial alcohol people, who consume over 80 per cent of this blackstrap and who are not demanding that it be put on the free list, be given now free blackstrap molasses, without their request, in order that the man who feeds for the market and who wants a duty on his hides and who wants a duty on the carcasses of his animals should save 6 cents per ton additional cost on his feed because of this duty which the House has placed in the Fordney bill. It is the most absurd proposition that I have ever heard of.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. In order that the Senator may catch his breath——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am not out of breath; I have just started.

Mr. PHIPPS. And so that I may not be misunderstood, I want to say, with his permission, that I was prevented from hearing his speech yesterday and I have not yet had time to read it in the RECORD. I was trying to ascertain his attitude to learn what he is advocating and upon what he bases it.

Briefly, in just a word, I want to say that so far as my information from the sugar producers is concerned they are not interested in the question of whether there is or is not to be a duty on blackstrap molasses. The consumers of blackstrap molasses in the alfalfa-feed mills, however, called my attention to the fact that up to a certain percentage they felt that it was all right, but the percentage had been set at 48 in the House instead of 56, and they thought that the additional duty should not apply until it reached 56; and that is what I advocated before the Finance Committee. I have advocated nothing beyond that. I was not present when the Finance Committee decided on the rate, and can not say on what it based its decision to put blackstrap on the free list, but that is my information, that that has been done. It was done, as far as I am aware, at the urgent request of the alfalfa-feed mills.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I would ask the Senator who, except the feed manufacturers of this country, advocated free blackstrap molasses before the Finance Committee?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am sorry I can not inform the Senator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. They are the only people who advocated it, and when they got through advocating it they joined the feeders and dairymen and asked the committee to give them a duty on the carcasses of animals, on the hides, and on butter. I come from the Democratic side of this Chamber.

Mr. PHIPPS. I notice the Senator is sitting very near the corner.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am a protectionist.

Mr. PHIPPS. So am I.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I announced my candidacy in the State of Louisiana as a protectionist, and I have voted for protection, and I stand here now and claim that which I have accorded to every other State in the Union. I am not familiar with the beet-sugar industry, but I know the cane-sugar industry from top to bottom. I do believe you use your blackstrap molasses for feeding purposes, do you not?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is my information.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then what is the idea in asking this committee to put blackstrap on the free list, in so far as industrial alcohol and feeding purposes are concerned? Have you not jumped across this way and taken a stand like that taken by some of my friends over here who want to have a certain industry protected but are not willing to accord protection to another State or another section?

Mr. PHIPPS. Of course, I am perfectly willing always to stand my share; but I submit that the Senator has no information upon which to base the statement that I advocated that it be put on the free list.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I misunderstood, and I apologize to the Senator. I understood that to be his statement just now.

Mr. PHIPPS. The fixing of the percentage at which the additional tariff should apply was at the request of the alfalfa feed people. I do not know where the other movement originated or started.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is the only movement, and I am explaining that it originated with the American Sugar Trust, and the soap manufacturers, who want to have free blackstrap molasses in competition with the grain manufacturers of this country, in order to pan off their cottonseed meal and their cottonseed hulls, and whatever scraps they can buy, and all the sweepings they can get in all the warehouses of this country, and all the feed that is alone not acceptable or consumable by any animal, but which, when smeared with blackstrap molasses, will be palatable and undersell corn and oats. I am surprised that so many Senators on this floor have accepted this plea, which is so indefensible, and are permitting the people who are underselling the corn and the oats with inferior and unconsumable stuff, but which, when mixed with molasses, will undersell the very grain they are producing in their States, to get away with it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I want to ask him one question now, because I am compelled to leave the Chamber. At what price has the blackstrap molasses of the Louisiana sugar refiners been selling on the market?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will answer that, and I am glad to answer it at this time, although I expected to go over that very proposition later. Penick & Ford, who started this propaganda and who are manufacturers of Louisiana molasses and sirups, have furnished a document, to which I shall refer presently, in which they say that blackstrap is blackstrap, like "pigs is pigs." They make no difference, and the Louisiana blackstrap molasses must sell in competition with the cheapest kind of Cuban by-products and must bring the same price. When they buy ours they sell it to you in Colorado for Louisiana sirups and molasses, but we can not get a larger price because they do not make any differentiation between the Louisiana product, which is a very high product, and that imported from the other side. Here is the average they give: Pre-war in New Orleans, 4 to 4½ cents a gallon. Last year it was less than 3 cents a gallon, and it cost us nearly that much to get it to the market.

I want to explain to the Senator, if he must leave, that that is just the question with us; not the making of a profit from this by-product, but we must get enough protection to permit us to market it, because unless you market it, it is the most disagreeable thing you can have on the plantation. You must set aside certain acreage of your plantation in order to keep it within bounds, because if it gets in the drainage ditches it will worry everybody in the country. If you turn it into the streams the United States marshal arrests you. We were asking 1 cent duty per gallon on this and the House gave us a quarter of a cent per gallon, and I doubt very seriously whether the quarter of a cent would permit us to bring it to market. But if we got that quarter of a cent we would be willing to go into our pockets for a little bit of a sum in order to get it from the plantation.

What are we to do with it? If we let it get into the streams it pollutes the streams, it kills the fish, and the marshal arrests us for doing it. If we are denied this almost insignificant duty we can not market it, and it will become then a very heavy expense to us.

Mr. PHIPPS. And you expect to have the 1 cent per gallon duty added, which would give you 4 to 5 cents a gallon for your product?

Mr. BROUSSARD. We would like to have that.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is where you would land.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have not reached that yet. That is what we asked the Ways and Means Committee to do, and I wish to state at this time that the Ways and Means Committee proposed to allow us three-quarters of a cent per gallon. The House defeated that under this new propaganda, which nobody had discovered, and the motive of which the dairymen and the feed people and the grain people had not then discovered. They reduced it to one-quarter of a cent, and the Finance Committee foolishly cuts off this quarter of a cent a gallon.

Mr. PHIPPS. The quarter of a cent was added as the percentage of the sugar in the molasses increased. There is a graduated scale, according to my recollection.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That was the basis: One-quarter of a cent for 48° total sugar and two hundred and seventy-five one-thousandths for each additional degree. I wish to say to the Senator that if he takes the Louisiana blackstrap molasses which he buys in the market as a sample, he absolutely does not know what blackstrap is, because hardly any State in the Union has ever fed Louisiana blackstrap molasses except on the plantation where it is made. Whatever gets on the market is sold at the rate of 95 cents a gallon after they run it through a filter. Louisiana blackstrap molasses is the only molasses that comes within the degrees the Senator has mentioned.

I wish to make this statement, and I know I speak with authority in this: We wanted 1 cent a gallon duty on blackstrap molasses, and we were accorded by the Ways and Means Committee three-fourths cent, and, as I expect to show later, the feed people of the United States organized a national association in Tennessee in 1917, and were prodded on by the enemies of the sugar industry of this country, and by Penick & Ford, of New Orleans, and then by the soap manufacturers, who wanted to put blackstrap on the free list in order to add additional profits which they are making on molasses and on inferior feedstuffs over the grain growers of this country. They prodded the dairy people and the feeders to demand the lowering of the rate, and when the Fordney bill reached the floor of the House Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, on behalf of the feed people, made the motion to reduce the rate from three-fourths of a cent to one-fourth cent per gallon, and it was carried. The rate carried by the House bill was what they wanted. Nobody in the House knew anything about this propaganda then, and they are excusable for their action; but this propaganda continued, and having decreased the rate to what they wanted, they then proceeded to defeat their own rate. I wish to say that the greatest disappointment ever met with by propagandists was when the Finance Committee made the exception that any blackstrap molasses imported for the purpose of human consumption should pay the tax. They are themselves now under the exception which the Finance Committee has imposed, entirely left out of the benefits which they started out to secure for themselves. I am glad of that, and anybody who understands the sugar situation in the United States knows that the American Sugar Trust and the enemies of the domestic sugar producers, which includes the international bankers of the United States who make loans to Cuban sugar producers, which includes many manufacturers in the United States, have had no limit to which they would not go in order to accomplish that which has been their goal since 1887—the absolute control and domination of the American market in so far as sugar and its by-products are concerned.

I now appeal to the members of the Finance Committee. This is an old story, with which all of them are familiar, and I am speaking the truth when I say that this movement originated with the enemies of the domestic sugar producers of the country, and whether the committee intended it or not, I am very happy they have not been included within the exemptions extended by the committee.

Mr. President, I now wish to refer again to the pamphlet entitled "Industrial Alcohol," by Mr. Tunison, previously referred to. I am sorry that all of the Senators who represent constituents who are feeders in the country and those who grow grain are not present to hear me. In a table are set forth the various products which may be converted into industrial alcohol. I wish to compare only the amount of alcohol which may be obtained from a given unit of sugar molasses and of maize, which is corn. We find that out of 1 ton of sugar molasses 65 gallons of industrial alcohol may be manufactured, and out of 1 ton of maize 85 gallons of industrial alcohol. It is the simplest proposition that any man ever tried to solve. I know that whenever alcohol is mentioned there are a great many people who are prejudiced against it, but the industrial alcohol industry of any country is one of the most important that any civilized nation could ever have. Germany's wonderful progress in the sciences, as I have demonstrated before, was due to her encouragement in the manufacture of low-cost alcohol.

When we figure that a ton of corn will only make 85 gallons of alcohol, and then we find that a ton of blackstrap molasses, containing 117 gallons, which they buy at 3 cents a gallon, which is less than $4 a ton, may compete with corn at less than $5 a ton, what are the grain people thinking about when they want to open the door wide open and give to the industrial alcohol people—who, by the way, are not asking for this rate—cheaper molasses in order to compete with the grain growers of the country? For $4 of blackstrap they can manufacture nearly as much alcohol as they can out of a ton of corn. Figure what the value of the corn per bushel would be at that price.

It is perfectly amazing to me that Senators should be swayed by a man who feeds 20 head of stock or a man who has 100 head of cattle, and who says, "Please give me cheap feed and bring in blackstrap molasses free." He is only repeating what the feed compounder in this country has told him to repeat. Then he turns around to the same committee and says, "But please protect my butter, because I can not compete; please protect my calves and my cows, because I can not compete; but give me cheaper feed."

I demonstrated yesterday that out of every ton of feedstuff which the feed manufacturers of the country put on the market and sell to the dairymen or to the feeder, they make on the blackstrap content on that ton alone, without considering the practicability of the use of inferior products, a profit of $4.57½ a ton, because they buy it at 3 cents a gallon and there are nearly 12 pounds to the gallon. They sell the feed containing 400 pounds of blackstrap molasses to every ton at 1.4 cents a pound, and therefore they realize an enormous profit out of the gallon of blackstrap. Also, in the inferior products that they palm off on the feeder in competition with the better grades of feed, and at the same time make the animal eat the inferior feed which was being capitalized by him. He is making on the molasses content $4.57½ from every ton sold to these people, and then he says, "Unless you cry out against this duty I will have to raise the price of feed." That is the situation.

This pamphlet is one issued by one of the several industrial alcohol concerns that converts practically 90 per cent of all the blackstrap imported into this country into alcohol, and if I am using their chief chemist as my authority on this proposition I know I can not be wrong. I wish to refer to the industrial alcohol proposition on pages 385–6:

> Cane molasses. The chief source of industrial alcohol in the United States is cane or blackstrap molasses. Only a few years ago the disposal of molasses by the sugar mills was a serious trade waste problem.

I wish now to call the attention of the committee that unless we award a duty upon this article it will again become a serious trade waste problem with the people of my State, because they will have to market it at a loss or sustain a loss in order to impound it upon their own properties.

Continuing:

> But it is now very largely used the world over as a raw material for alcohol manufacture. In the East and West Indies molasses disposal was a matter of expense. The conversion of molasses into alcoholic liquor, especially into rum, is an old enterprise. West Indies rum has been famous in New England for more than 200 years, and the use of molasses in large quantities for industrial alcohol production is a development of the last few years. As far as ease of manipulation is concerned, molasses unquestionably surpasses any other known material. Also, in the past it has been a very cheap material. Ordinarily it contains both sucrose and reducing sugars in varying proportions.

To those who are not familiar with the sugar industry I wish to explain that that means dextrose and levulose which the cane juice contains and which prevents the crystalization of a certain proportion of the sucrose into crystals, and when you are through with the blackstrap molasses, you have not only that portion of sucrose which it does not pay to further convert, but you have additional sugars, dextrose and levulose, which are just as valuable in the manufacture of alcohol or in the feeding of cattle as is the sucrose which has not been crystallized.

Continuing:

> The grades used by distillers usually contain between 45 and 60 per cent of sugars.

I want to call the attention of the committee to what I stated yesterday. Here is a chemist, an expert of the principal industrial alcohol plant in the United States, who beyond controversy demonstrates to the committee that when they fix 65 per cent total sugars, they let in every drop of blackstrap molasses into the country free of duty. Here is a firm which would be very largely benefited. Here is one that will be more largely benefited by having blackstrap on the free list than all the cattle feeders and all the sirup and molasses makers for human consumption combined could benefit. I am not talking wildly when I say that. The output of this one plant in alcohol is immense, and what they would save if this article were put on the free list, as the amendment proposes to do, would place in the coffers of this corporation more money than all of the cattle feeders and all the dairy people and all the manufacturers of molasses for human consumption combined could save.

I wish to repeat this to show how wrong the committee is:

> The grades used by distillers usually contain between 45 and 60 per cent sugars, averaging about 50.

So that the minimum amount which the Finance Committee have fixed as 56 is, according to this authority, 6 degrees over the average blackstrap molasses imported into this country. I can not altogether excuse the committee, because if the committee were thoroughly convinced that no sugar could be extracted out of what they intended to admit free of duty they would not have added this clause, and I direct the attention of the committee to it, because it proves my statement of yesterday and the statement which I am making now. I am reading from paragraph 1615a:

> Molasses not testing above 56 per cent total sugars—

What does it say after that?—

> not imported to be commercially used for the extraction of sugar.

If the idea of the committee was to let in blackstrap molasses to be used exclusively in the manufacture of feedstuffs, why did they not fix the limit so that they would not have to employ this clause? They have gone 6 per cent of total over the highest amount which is ever imported. The point I am making is that the committee deliberately, in my opinion, fixed 6 per cent greater than the maximum total sugars imported as blackstrap. If they had been innocent about it, they should not have put in these words—

> not imported to be commercially used for the extraction of sugar—

because if they mean to put on the free list only blackstrap molasses they should have fixed that degree which we are asking for. Then they would not have to worry about the extraction of sugars from blackstrap molasses.

I think that the man largely responsible for that was on the floor yesterday, the chairman of the Tariff Commission. I have stated to the committee—and I have some knowledge of the sugar business and of sugar manufacturing—that whenever they fixed on 52 per cent they were clearly 4 degress above what had been accepted in the past as the dividing line between blackstrap molasses and molasses fit for human consumption; and that there was no reason to yield to the importunities of people who merely imagined that they would be obliged to pay an increase in the cost of the feed which they gave their cows. The committee disregarded the advice, but they are absolutely wrong, as I can show by every authority, not only in the United States but in the world, who knows anything about sugar and molasses. I intend to go as far as I can, because I have other authorities.

Yesterday I quoted the experts who were appointed by the Food Administration to relieve the imposition upon the public of people who were charging 95 cents a gallon for blackstrap molasses. The complaint reached here that there was a misrepresentation of the goods; that they were giving us a minimum price for our Louisiana molasses, running it through a filter and selling it as first-class sirup.

These experts—and mind you, Mr. President, two of them were from Lousiana, both of them being thoroughly acquainted with the Louisiana sugar industry—in the face of the fact that it was selling for 27 cents on the plantation, fixed a maximum price of 18 cents a gallon. The commodity which was being thus sold in the New Orleans market was almost exclusively a Louisiana product, because the imported molasses did not begin to come within 10 per cent of the total sugars of the Louisiana product. The imported article was sold to the industrial alcohol manufacturers and to the feed people in this country. We fixed our own maximum price, not the average price, and said that nobody should sell it for more than 18 cents a gallon.

I wish to reiterate—for it is very significant—that the industrial alcohol people, in contradiction of whatever information the Finance Committee may have had from the Tariff Commission when they fixed 56 per cent at the behest of the feed manufacturers, but not feed growers, without any request on their part are being granted over 90 per cent of the relief which it is desired to afford to the dairymen and the cattle feeders, and yet they say that the grades used by the distillers usually contain between 45 and 60 per cent total sugars. Those are the two extremes, the average being about 50. So the committee, in the face of the statements of the people who are most largely to benefit by it and who confessedly are not prejudiced against us, although they are the beneficiaries, have fixed 6 per cent above the actual facts as disclosed by the trade.

I wish also to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have a Bureau of Standards, in which we now have a sugar division. The chief of that division is Mr. T. C. Bates, who is the assistant director. After having applied to Mr. Bates and Mr. Stratton, the director, I have a letter from them this morning, dated June 14, which is addressed to me, in which they say:

> In reply to your request of even date, I am pleased to give you below a list of current analyses of blackstrap molasses. The data show the direct polarization and the total sugars for each sample. These samples cover all that were received between definite dates. This was done in order that they may be entirely representative of the average molasses received by the Bureau of Standards for accurate testing. A definite fee is charged for each sample. The samples were submitted by commercial concerns and the data are presumably used as a basis of settlement between buyer and seller. We believe the samples here represented are somewhat better in quality and therefore run somewhat higher in total sugars than the average Cuban blackstrap. In normal years it is generally considered by the trade that the average blackstrap will test around 52 per cent total sugars.

I have here, Mr. President, the different samples which have been submitted; and I wish to state that the maximum sugar content in any sample submitted was 57.24 per cent, but this letter specifically states that in total sugars contained these samples are all far above the molasses imported from Cuba. The statement from which I have read, of course, comes from a disinterested source.

As I quoted from the pamphlet issued by the industrial alcohol producers a while ago—and the producers of industrial alcohol are one of the chief beneficiaries of the amendment proposed by the committee—I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to a document issued by Penick & Ford (Ltd., Inc.), of New Orleans. I have here, Mr. President, a circular which they sent broadcast giving the analyses of some 35 samples of blackstrap molasses. I wish to read to the Senate the figures as to the total sugars contained in the samples which they analyzed. Mind you, Mr. President, these people are not engaged in buying blackstrap molasses for industrial alcohol, nor are they engaged in buying blackstrap molasses for cattle feeding, but they are interested in buying blackstrap molasses for human consumption. The heading on their circular reads:

> Penick & Ford (Ltd.) (Inc.).
> Sugar, cane, and corn products.
> New Orleans, La.

They do not sell anything to the industrial alcohol producers nor do they sell anything to the cattle feeders of this country. Every gallon which they buy is intended for human consumption, and we may therefore naturally assume that they buy a higher grade of molasses than is bought by the two other classes of consumers of blackstrap molasses in this country. I wish to put in the RECORD a statement of the total sugars disclosed by their analyses of the different blackstrap molasses which they have listed by name. For instance, the analyses show that in the kind of blackstrap molasses called Rochelle the total sugar content is 45.02 per cent; Marcoris, 45.64 per cent—let us bear in mind that the committee has fixed a limit of 56 per cent total sugars—J. O. Boyd, 47.24 per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I gladly yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Taking the 56 per cent blackstrap molasses, how many pounds of sugar can be extracted from that molasses?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that some of the sugar in blackstrap molasses is what we call invert sugar, and is of such a character as to prevent the extraction of 100 per cent of sucrose out of the juice, so that the proportion of sugar which is extractable will depend upon the proportion of dextrose and levulose, which are sugars also contained in the molasses.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Taking the blackstrap molasses of 56 per cent to which the Senator has referred, what would be the average amount of sugar possibly extractable from such molasses?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is impossible to give an answer in pounds.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Can the Senator state the amount approximately?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is impossible to give the answer in pounds, but if it was ascertained that in the blackstrap there was a certain percentage of levulose and a certain percentage of dextrose, then any chemist could figure the extractable sugar.

Mr. NICHOLSON. That is true. I thought perhaps, however, the Senator had that data.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I regret that I have not.

Mr. NICHOLSON. In California a few years ago, during the war, there was a great deal of accumulated blackstrap molasses, and a certain gentleman invented a process by which he extracted a large quantity of sugar out of the blackstrap molasses and placed it on the market as salable sugar. What I am trying to develop now is whether the blackstrap molasses imported into this country, say from Cuba, or wherever it may come from, is susceptible of being so treated as to extract a salable sugar to be placed upon the market.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I can not give a definite answer as to pounds unless a specific proposition is submitted. I may say, however, that it is doubtful whether or not any sugar could be economically extracted out of blackstrap molasses testing 54 per cent total sugars under the present market price, because the sugar is very cheap; but if the Cuban-American Sugar Trust should again hold the American people in its grip, as it did in 1920, when it advised the Cuban sugar producer to hold his sugar, which he had offered to the Government at 6½ cents a pound, for a price of 24 cents, so that it reached the consumer at a price of from 28 to 30 cents, then the committee knows that under those conditions sugar would be extracted out of molasses testing 56 per cent total sugars, because they took the precaution to provide against such an extraction by putting in a provision subjecting it to a duty. I may say to the Senator, however, that in my opinion whenever your beet sugar sells for 6 cents to 6½ cents a pound it is practicable and it is economical, I believe, for the sugar refiners at certain periods, when business is dull and when they want to carry on operations over the dull period, to go into the extraction of sugar out of 56 per cent total sugars after an examination of the sample in order to ascertain the surplus of the sucrose contents over the total of the dextrose and levulose, which is the margin of extraction.

I could think of samples containing 58 per cent that would not pay to extract the sugar, but I could think of samples of 55 and 54 per cent, where the proportion of sucrose was greater than the total of dextrose and levulose, where they would absolutely take it out and then sell the residue for blackstrap molasses again, or they might go further in that process; they might refine it and sell it for sirups and molasses for human consumption.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that about a month ago an attorney came into my office, well known to myself—in fact, he was an attorney from my home town—and presented to me the result of a new discovery in the extraction of sugar from molasses. The inventor of it is a Mr. Cutler. They were applying for a patent, and he showed me the different grades of sirups made from molasses that could be put upon the market, and the percentage of sugar that could be taken out profitably from 40 per cent sugar content in the molasses.

Mr. GERRY. Does the Senator mean total sugars, or the polariscope test?

Mr. SMOOT. Total sugars under the sugar test. By the way, I will say that young Mr. Cutler is the son of Thomas R. Cutler, the father, we often call him, of the beet-sugar industry in America. It was a remarkable statement that was made by the attorney who had the patent in hand. I will say that the patent has not been issued yet, but if they realize a small part of what they claim for it, the whole question of molasses and the extraction of sugar from it and the sirups will be revolutionized, not only in this country but in the world.

I recognize that many patents never materialize; but they had samples of the five grades of sirups that are made from 40 per cent molasses, and the sugar that was extracted from it, and the claims that were made were really remarkable. As to whether the result will materialize in a practical way or not, I can not say; but I do say that if a small part of all that they claim is realized, this whole question of the production of sugar from molasses is going to be revolutionized, not only in this country but in the world.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, just along those lines, I am glad the Senator made this suggestion. The possibilities of chemistry are just opening. It is a question of reducing the various systems of production to an economic basis where it will be profitable; but we know, for instance, that chemists can take sawdust and make starch, they can then take the starch and make alcohol. They can take the sugar and make alcohol, and it is just a rearrangement of the elements composing the carbohydrate. Now, levulose and dextrose and sucrose are practically the same thing in chemistry, and if we stop to think that they have demonstrated that they can make sugar out of sawdust and make alcohol out of it, or sugar into alcohol, I do not doubt that very soon the sugar chemists will find a way either to convert the dextrose and levulose into sucrose, or at any rate to neutralize them and release the sucrose which is held down under the present conditions and prevented from crystallizing. Those things are within the possibilities, and they are not only within the possibilities but we may expect those things to be done very soon.

I will say this, and I should like to make this statement, because I know the facts: The Louisiana sugar industry has been denounced on this floor and on the floor of the other House for a hundred years. It has been said that it is a hothouse plant, and it is this, and it is that, and they have charged that to us. I want to say to anybody who knows the sugar industry of the world that Louisiana deserves the credit for having reduced the world price of sugar from 12 cents and more to what you can buy it for to-day. We have had a sugar school in my State for 60 years. There is not a cane-growing plantation of any consequence in the universe to-day that has not a Louisiana sugar man at the head of its factory and at the head of its sugar chemistry, who not only takes care of the fertilizing of the soil for the purpose of obtaining the maximum amount of sucrose and the diminution of the dextrose and the levulose, which is an enemy of the sugar industry, but in the plant we have reduced the cost.

We have had within my recollection in the domestic sugar industry not less than ten reversals, and whenever we were thrown down we availed ourselves of science and we met the reduction, and whenever they let us alone for six years we met the price of our competitors. The prices of sugar, dating back from the origin of this Government to date, show a drop from decade to decade, all of which is reflected not from the beet-sugar manufacturers of this country and Europe, but is reflected from the cane production of the West Indies, of South America, of India, and of the world. It is the cane sugar that has brought down that price, and it is, I should say, the only article of food the price of which has continually declined from the time it became generally accepted as a human food to the present day. There has been a general decline, without any variation, most of which I claim was due to the expert knowledge and the information obtained in the sugar-cane fields and in the laboratories in the State of Louisiana.

I did not get through; I was diverted, but I should like to insert the column to which I was referring before this interruption, circulated by the Penick & Ford Co. (Inc.), giving the total sugars of all the molasses which they brought into New Orleans, their domicile, and the location of their factories. The largest percentage of total sugars was 53.78, and that is the only sample that disclosed this much total sugars; so that when the committee fix the minimum at 56 per cent total sugars, they have exceeded by 2.12 per cent the highest total sugars sample ever received by this chief enemy of a duty on this very article. I can not vouch for the correctness of that; the total sugars might have been less; but the people interested in driving down this duty and putting the product on the free list admit that they have had a sample as high as 53 per cent, which means that very probably this sample contained less; but I wish to have this table inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

"Total sugars" in blackstrap molasses received by Penick & Ford (Ltd.) (Inc.), New Orleans, La.

Proposed tariff provides for duty of 1 cent per gallon on molasses testing 48 per cent "total sugars" plus two hundred and seventy-five one-thousandths of 1 cent for each additional per cent or fraction thereof. Blackstrap molasses is not bought or sold on sugar test. Blackstrap is blackstrap, same as "pigs is pigs." No sugars can be profitably extracted from blackstrap, and there is no sense in departing from custom of entering blackstrap as "molasses not over 40 degrees by polariscope." An ad valorem duty based on American money valuation in country from which shipment is made is most scientific, as it provides for an increase and decrease as supply and demand create the market.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who happens to be near me at this time, was interested yesterday to know if blackstrap molasses was ever used for human consumption. I have here a document which was issued by Mr. Payne, who is in charge of the molasses division of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Agricultural Department. For instance, here is the molasses on the market, and this is issued by this bureau. It does not say where it came from, but it says:

Sells straight cane sirup under brand names, and mixture of cane and corn sirups down to 50 per cent cane and 50 per cent corn sirup, called New Orleans molasses—

It cost the farmers of my country many a drop of sweat and many a sacrifice to make a reputation for this New Orleans molasses. What does it contain now, according to the Department of Agriculture?

Formulas of sirup mixers:
Sixty per cent first centrifugal molasses—

A centrifugal molasses is not a molasses at all in the sense that the New Orleans molasses was known, which is made under an entirely different process.

Sixty per cent first centrifugal molasses, 40 per cent corn.

Here is another one:

Eighty per cent first centrifugal molasses, 20 per cent corn.
Seventy-five per cent first centrifugal molasses, 25 per cent corn.
Fifty per cent first centrifugal molasses, 50 per cent corn.

One of our by-products.

Now, take the cottonseed fellows, the cattle-feed people; for instance, Procter & Gamble. The Soap Trust owns half of the cottonseed crushers in my State.

Cottonseed hull, corn chop, cottonseed meal, alfalfa dust—

And cobs, I might add, because I know it. It is not contained here, but in the case of anything that the cattle will not eat it is only necessary to put molasses over it and they will eat it.

I will go back again, in order to quote accurately:

Cottonseed hull, corn chop, cottonseed meal, alfalfa dust, salt for palatability, average use of molasses 15 per cent.

That is what these people use. Most feeders use 20 per cent; some use 40 per cent.

Feed mixers are of three classes: First, the manufacturers of cereal foods making feeds from their by-products.

Do they want to deny us protection because molasses is a by-product? Do they want to give that advantage to the manufacturers of the cereal foods, who may get free molasses and convert these by-products of theirs in competition with the corn and the oats and the barley and hay grown by the farmers of this country?

First, the manufacturers of cereal foods making feeds from their by-products, using blackstrap molasses; second, manufacturers who have by-products at strategic shipping points who, if need be, can buy all the ingredients; third, concerns like Procter & Gamble, who do not manufacture foods, but have large accumulation of by-products from cottonseed oil, such as hulls, meal, etc.

I can explain what the "etc." stands for. I have seen these feeds manufactured in my State. I have seen them go and buy a haystack which had been standing in the lot for months, which stock would not touch even though starving. I have seen them take it and run it through a chopper and put 20 per cent molasses in it, and the animals would leave fresh corn, one month in the barn, and eat this old stuff. When they got rid of this old hay or these sweepings, they were not only making a profit out of an article of food which animals would not eat, but for every ton of that food they sold to the man who feeds they made $4.575 profit on the molasses alone in that ton of feed. But they want to deny us 6 cents per ton protection. It is the most absurd thing I ever heard of.

In order to do that you will have to violate the opinion of every expert who knows anything about sugar and blackstrap molasses. You have put in that very clause a provision that if a man extracts sugar from that blackstrap molasses he must pay a duty, because you have made it so high that whenever sugar sells for over 6½ cents, you will find people extracting sugar from this molasses.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the Senator said just a moment ago that there was a duty of 6 cents a ton. Did he mean that?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; I did not mean that; I meant a duty of a quarter of a cent per gallon.

Mr. WILLIS. That is, on the molasses itself?

Mr. BROUSSARD. On the molasses; and you use 32.4 gallons per ton of feed.

Mr. WILLIS. Then how do you figure out the 6 cents?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will show the Senator. Every gallon of that brings us 3 cents, though we could not get 3 cents last year. The man sells that feed at an average price of $28 a ton, which is at the rate of 1.4 cents per pound. He uses 32.4 gallons per ton, which amounts to 400 pounds, because each gallon weighs 11.7 pounds.

Every pound of this molasses which he sells brings him 1.4 cents. There are 11.7 pounds to the gallon, so that each gallon brings him 16 and a fraction cents, and it costs him 3 cents. He makes a profit of 13 and a fraction cents per gallon for every gallon which he puts into this feed. But the addition of this duty of one-fourth of a cent to his 3 cents would make a difference of 6 cents a ton for the molasses which he puts into this ton of feed, if you take the minimum of 48 degrees, fixed under the Fordney bill. As you increase, you will find that the maximum which any man could be called upon to pay as an increase due to the Fordney tariff rate would be 34 cents per ton increase, without taking into consideration—and this, of course, would reduce it—the fact that there is now a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem on blackstrap up to 40 degrees, and 2½ cents above; so that if your molasses had only 15 degrees, it would be 15 per cent ad valorem; if it had 38 degrees, it would be 15 per cent ad valorem. So that there is a duty, and my figures must be reduced by that duty.

There is this other consideration, that that molasses at 56 degrees, which we are conceeding in order to meet this argument, is never put into industrial alcohol or into feedstuffs because there is a market for it for human consumption.

If the dairy people of the Senator's State want a duty on butter, want a duty on hides, and want a duty on the carcasses of the animals, what right have they to ask us to increase the profits of the feed manufacturer on the molasses consumed by the manufacturer in the production of a ton of feed, which, considered without the duty, would make him $4.56½, in order that he might not increase the price of his feedstuffs? The fellow is a profiteer now, so far as molasses is concerned, because he makes no distinction when he sells you a ton of feed. He sells you the 400 pounds of molasses at the same rate per pound as he does the other worthless feed which he has in it.

But I will go a little further with this: Every dark mixture primarily used for baking consists of 16 parts of Cuban blackstrap, 6 parts Louisiana centrifugals.

Whenever they use any of that stuff they put the Louisiana product in it because our finished product is so far superior to their finished product that there is the same difference between our blackstrap molasses and theirs; but I will come in a moment to what Penick & Ford, who started this propaganda, state. They say blackstrap is blackstrap, like "pigs is pigs."

Our blackstrap frequently carries 56 per cent total sugars. The Cuban product will go from 40 to 45 or 48 total sugars. But we bring our 56 per cent on the market—and I will read that to the Senate in a moment—and the man who buys our stuff says, "Blackstrap is blackstrap, like pigs is pigs," and he makes no distinction between the degrees of total sugars in the molasses. We received less than 3 cents in 1921 because the buyer could get blackstrap molasses from Cuba cheaper than we can sell it in New Orleans, because from the plantation to New Orleans the transportation rate is about twice as much as it is from Cuba to New Orleans by water.

This is what the Department of Agriculture says:

Some Cuban molasses is undoubtedly not fit for food, but I have never seen any I was unable to use.

It is a physical process. You filter it, and you get it down at the other end an edible article. If you compound it with good molasses, say, corn or sugar-cane sirup, and mix it in proportion, you can palm it off. You get this at 3 cents, and you do not sell it at 95 cents a gallon, but you sell it at that rate, because you sell the compound at that price, and therefore that proportion of it goes at that. But I shall reach presently the statement that they do sell it at 50 cents just as they receive it. We sell it to them at 3 cents, and they do not want us to have a duty of a quarter of a cent a gallon.

I want to read this to the Senate, because I think it will interest the Senator from Ohio and interest all the Senators from the grain States. This is from a statement submitted to Congressman MONDELL last year:

Inasmuch as the greater part of Cuban and Porto Rican is used for distilling spirits—distilled spirits, since the passage of prohibition amendment, being restricted to denatured alcohol and denatured rum used for tobacco manufacture. The latest report from internal revenue for fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, was 123,498,693 gallons of molasses used for the manufacture of distilled spirits. The total includes two sources of saccharine liquors from wood and sulphite liquors. In the year (fiscal) 1916 the total amount of such saccharine liquors other than cane molasses used for production of alcohol amounted to 4,070,113 gallons. It is possible, but has never exceeded 6,000,000 gallons.

Therefore cane molasses used for production ended June 30, 1919, was 117,000,000 gallons, in round figures.

The amount of molasses brought into the United States during the fiscal year 1919 was:

	Gallons.
Cuba	124, 254, 663
Porto Rico	15, 118, 678
Hawaii	11, 065, 996
All other	5, 820, 054
Total	156, 259, 391

This total consists almost exclusively of the grade known as blackstrap. Of the above total, 117,000,000 gallons were used for distilled spirits; 39,000,000 gallons for other purposes.

Domestic production, December, 1918, to September, 1919, approximately 16,000,000 gallons. Only negligible portion of blackstrap used for alcohol—

That is, they do not use our blackstrap for alcohol; it is too good. This continues:

Only negligible portion of blackstrap used for alcohol, therefore above added to imports approximates 55,000,000 gallons available for purposes other than alcohol, which was used primarily for human food and cattle feed. Small amounts used for making cores for foundries and for blacking.

Here is the point to which I wish to call attention:

Fifty-five million gallons used for feed equals 11,800,000 bushels of corn—

That is, chemically, and by demonstration—which it displaces. The 117,000,000 gallons used for alcohol making displaces 25,100,000 bushels of corn for alcohol making; making a total of 36,900,000 bushels of corn displaced by the use of blackstrap molasses.

In other words, the corn grower gets it both ways.

The feed manufacturers will not buy corn at 60 cents per bushel when they can get blackstrap molasses at 3 cents a gallon, and when 4⅔ gallons of blackstrap equal the caloric or feeding value of 1 bushel of corn. The industrial alcohol people will not buy corn at 60 cents a bushel when 6 gallons of blackstrap molasses will make the same quantity of alcohol as a bushel of corn. The farmers of Illinois have recognized that. I placed in the RECORD their estimate that the blackstrap molasses imported from Cuba displaces 40,000,000 bushels of corn in this country. If the man who wants protection on his butter and cattle and hides wants to put us on the free list, he is simply helping the man who is competing with his corn. He is destroying a domestic industry that is willing to help him get protection for what he wants. It is a very short-sighted policy for him to put the other fellow on the free list and to demand protection for himself.

Mr. President, I would like to insert in the RECORD two tables that came from the Department of Commerce which show the average per gallon duty imposed on blackstrap molasses entering this country between 1910 and 1920. They also show that the highest duty imposed on blackstrap molasses was 3.6 cents per gallon and that under the present law it amounts to 2.4 cents per gallon on the high grades. So that we submit to the Senate, considering that all previous administrations of both parties have accorded us a duty, it is most unwise now, when the rates are being raised on every article as compared to the existing rates under current law. In this particular instance, instead of giving us a similar increase, one which would follow the increases in the duties imposed on sugar, and inasmuch as this is a by-product of sugar, it is inconceivable that the Republican Party or the Finance Committee would want to go back and say, "Yes; we will take the current rate or the present rate on sugar under the current law, which is 1 cent, and we will make it 1.60, but we find that there is 15 per cent ad valorem on blackstrap molasses up to 40°, and above that 2½ cents a gallon, so we will increase the tariff on sugar, but the blackstrap will go backward and on the free list. We will go the Democratic Party one better." In other words, the committee say to the Democratic Party, "We will go you one better in one way by giving higher protection on sugar, and then we will go you one better the other way, because we dare to put blackstrap on the free list." It is an indefensible thing.

The two tables which I asked to have printed in the RECORD show the duties imposed on the imports of molasses from Cuba and the duties imposed upon imports of molasses from other countries than Cuba. I ask permission that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Without objection, the tables will be printed in the RECORD.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I wish to appeal to the grain growers who are taking an interest in this matter. I want to read, for instance, an experiment conducted in the State of Maryland, as shown in Bulletin 117, issued in April, 1907, by the Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station. They make the statement that using molasses in stock feed was tried as an experiment on six steers. I am not using a Louisiana experiment, where we have been conducting such experiments for 40 years. I am using a near-by State, a State farther north. The experiment showed that the digestibility of hay and corn mixed with molasses had increased 17 per cent; of crude fiber, 8.2 per cent; of entirely free extracts, 22 per cent; and of sugars, practically, 21 per cent. I quote from the pamphlet as follows:

These results show that the addition of molasses to a ration has a tendency to increase the digestibility of both hay and grain feed. This, coupled with the generally observed fact that molasses contributes toward making feeds more palatable and also acts as an appetizer, gives molasses a relatively high place as a stock feed and makes it more valuable than its analysis alone would indicate.

Here is the interesting part of the statement:

Comparisons of costs of to-day, using not the price of cash corn and oats but the average of the low prices quoted for delivery of these grains from December to May of 1917, shows molasses at 20 cents per gallon—

Just think of it. At that time the people here were paying 20 cents per gallon for molasses. As I said, we tried to contract for 3 cents a gallon last year.

Molasses at 20 cents a gallon is equal to $1.70 per hundred pounds; oats at 64 cents a bushel is equal to $2 per hundred pounds; corn at $1.20 per bushel is equal to $2.14 per hundred pounds. The above comparisons of value show oats to cost 17.6 cents per hundred pounds more than molasses and whole corn 25.8 cents per 100 pounds more than molasses.

What I am trying to show is that as an article of food it has been demonstrated by every agricultural station in the United States that oats and corn, when compared with their cost, are not as efficient as food for animals as is the blackstrap molasses. The bulletin further says:

The corn is only paralleled in food value with the molasses after the expense of crushing it shall have been incurred.

I come back now to the report of the committee on cane sirup and molasses made to the Food Administrator in 1918. On page 13 is a question which they propounded to every expert they could reach:

From practical use of molasses in feeding stock what would you consider its value as compared, say, with the value of corn? In other words, what price would blackstrap molasses have to reach to induce you to quit feeding it entirely and feed only corn, oats, hay, or other farm products?

Here is what the committee reports:

One answer fixed the price at 12 cents per gallon; the next lowest was 20 cents per gallon, and the highest 40 cents per gallon, the average being 26 cents per gallon, while others answered that they would feed some blackstrap at any price. In addition to the above information, we have called a number of persons before us to ascertain their views as to what they would consider a fair price for blackstrap molasses, and their estimates ranged from 18 cents to 25 cents per gallon, a great majority naming the latter price.

A number of experiments have been conducted by the Agricultural Department of the United States Government and some of the agricultural departments of the States, and they rate blackstrap as a stock feed very high, equal in value to corn, pound for pound.

The committee, while they had all the information which fixed the price as an article of food from 40 cents down to 20 cents, and finding that the article was being sold for human consumption in many cases at 95 cents a gallon, taking into consideration everything—and out of five members there were two from Louisiana—fixed a maximum price on this product of 18 cents per gallon. So it can be easily understood that the grain growers are just as much interested in the proposition as we are, except that if they can not get rid of their corn which is displaced by this product they can feed it on the farm, or at any rate, it will not make it oppressive or inconvenient for their neighbors. But with us, what we need is a small protection which will permit us to market the product in order to get it off the plantation where it is a perfect nuisance, and where it can not be taken care of except at great sacrifice and great expense.

Mr. President, I think I have said about all I want to say with reference to the matter. I appeal to the committee. If there is anything I have said that is not absolutely according to the facts I would like to have it called to my attention. I have stated previously that for a number of years, before we Louisiana people showed the value of this article as a foodstuff and then showed its value as an article which would be converted into industrial alcohol, we were put to great expense and sacrifice of land and having disagreeable odors and fermentation on the property which made it disagreeable even for the passers-by on the roadside. As I said, we can not put the product into the streams, because if we do we pollute the water and kill the fish and we are arrested under a Federal statute. We must set aside a certain piece of land of equal value with the rest of the farm in order to impound it there, and year after year we have the same thing to contend with.

All we need is a little bit of protection to permit us to bring it to market. Whether we make a profit out of it or not is not the question. We want to be relieved of it. There is no reason for placing it on the free list when the industrial alcohol people, who are using over 90 per cent of this by-product imported into the country, have not asked that it be placed on the free list. It is only the feed people and the dairy people who have asked it. They have asked it because they conceive that the feed manufacturer is going to raise the price of feed unless it is put on the free list. They have never raised that question before.

Now that we are increasing all rates it is beyond reason for the committee to propose to put us on the free list while increasing every other article of American product. We would like to have, as we said before the Ways and Means Committee, a 1 cent tariff duty. The House made it, in answer to the demand of the feed manufacturers, one-quarter of a cent. I do not know what rate I shall propose. The Senator from Illinois has an amendment pending proposing to make the rate 10 cents a gallon. My people have never asked that rate before either committee.

I wish to make the request now, if it meets with the approval of the chairman of the Finance Committee, that we permit this paragraph to go over, to be taken up with paragraph 1615a, so that when we pass upon that paragraph we can pass upon this one at the same time. I understand the Senator from Illinois desires to urge his amendment at that time. It will naturally be disposed of at that same time. Otherwise I shall be compelled to ask for a vote now as to a few words which I do not think would bind us at all. I hope the chairman of the Finance Committee will permit this paragraph to go over until we come to the consideration of paragraph 1615a, which proposes to put this article on the free list. In the meantime I hope that the committee may reconsider this matter, so that we may have some kind of proper readjustment.

Mr. McCUMBER. The matter may be passed over for the day at least, and I will consult with the Senator from Louisiana as to a time at which it may subsequently be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over temporarily.

Mr. GERRY. I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that he intends to pass over the amendment in paragraph 503?

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment which has just been discussed is in the molasses paragraph, which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] has asked may go over until we consider the sugar schedule, and the paragraph in the free list covering molasses testing not above 56 per cent total sugars.

Mr. GERRY. As I understand, the paragraph 503 bears a relation to paragraph 1615a, on page 227, which places a certain class of molasses on the free list. Paragraph 1615a will not be considered until the free list is reached; but the amendment in paragraph 503 will be considered now unless the Senator has asked that it go over.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have asked that it may go over now for the day, at the request of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. GERRY. I could not hear the Senator, and that is what I was trying to get straightened out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance a copy of resolutions recently adopted at the annual convention of the American Feed Manufacturers' Association, requesting free entry of blackstrap molasses—the product which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] has just been discussing.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and order to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the American Feed Manufacturers' Association, in convention assembled at Chicago, Ill., June 8 and 9, 1922, said association representing approximately 150 manufacturers of feeding stuffs from all sections of the United States, employing a capital of more than $100,000,000, That we respectfully urge Congress in the interest of this important industry and in the interest of the dairymen, cattlemen, and consumers of meats, poultry, eggs, and dairy products, and the users of feeds for horses and mules, to permit free entry of blackstrap molasses for feed purposes.

That we also respectfully ask Congress in passing the tariff bill to follow the original House draft in fixing the tariff on ground and unground screenings. We consider it detrimental to the American farmer, manufacturers, and consumer to place a higher duty on the raw material (unground screenings) than on the manufactured article (ground screenings), especially in view of the fact that screenings ground in Canada is so imperfectly done that it does not eliminate the only objection that can be raised to the use of screenings as feed, viz, the possibility of befouling American soils.

That we also respectfully call the attention of Congress to the fact that the importation of ground screenings, when prices are low as at present, is impracticable on account of high freight rates. Ground screenings must be bagged or sacked before shipment and then shipped by railroad at high freight rates, whereas unground screenings are usually shipped in bulk by water at very much lower rates.

Unanimously adopted on June 9, 1922.

Attest:

L. F. BROWN, Secretary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article in the New York World of June 14. I will merely read the headlines of the article, which are as follows:

Bounty on potash urged with tariff as boost for HALE. Maine Senator convinces committee, but SMOOT charges it is mere electioneering. Plan would cost public $40,000,000 in five years.

I feel that this article is so unjust to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it becomes my duty to correct the misstatement. The Senator from Maine did appear before the committee and earnestly opposed any tariff on potash. He never discussed, however, with the committee the question of a bounty in the place of a tariff, nor did he refer to it in any way, shape, or manner. After he had left the committee the members who were present took up the subject and tentatively proposed in lieu of the tariff to place potash upon the free list, and for the purpose of protecting, or at least encouraging the American industry, to grant a bounty equivalent to tariff rate for a period of five years, and at the same tariff rate. That is, however, but tentatively proposed, and no final decision will have been made until the committee reports the matter to the Senate. The reason for the protection which was given by the Committee on Ways and Means was that during the war the price of potash rose to $450 per ton, and it was thought best by the Committee on Ways and Means to protect it for a period of five years, with a gradually diminishing tariff, so that potash would be free at the expiration of five years. During the boom incident to the war, however, when the price encouraged the greatest possible development, the production of potash was but 54,000 tons. If we should provide a bounty to-day there would be nothing paid on it, because there is not a single one of the potash factories in operation; and if we should even go up to a production of 50,000 tons a year, during the next few years the amount would not exceed $2,500,000 for the first year, $2,500,000 for the second year, $2,000,000 for the third year, $1,500,000 for the fourth year, and $1,000,000 for the fifth year. That is on a basis of possible production of 50,000 tons a year.

However, I did not rise at this time to discuss the merits of the proposition at all, but simply to explain the part which the Senator from Maine took before the committee in asking that potash be put on the free list and to state what was the limit of his request.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from North Dakota think that the Committee on Finance will report in favor of the proposition of putting potash on the free list?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the committee has decided to do that.

Mr. President, I now ask that we return to paragraph 302, page 41, line 15. I think we have covered everything in the paragraph except one clause.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKinley	Shortridge
Ball	Gooding	McNary	Simmons
Borah	Harreld	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	Harris	Newberry	Spencer
Bursum	Harrison	Nicholson	Sterling
Calder	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Sutherland
Cameron	Johnson	Norris	Swanson
Capper	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Caraway	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Ladd	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Lenroot	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Elkins	McCormick	Ransdell	Willis
Ernst	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] on business of the Senate.

I also wish to state that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In paragraph 302, page 49, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "72" and insert "60," so as to read:

ferrotungsten, metallic tungsten, tungsten powder, tungstic acid, and all other compounds of tungsten, 60 cents per pound on the tungsten contained therein.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I supposed we had disposed of that item.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that I asked that it go over for further consideration of the duty of 45 cents per pound on the tungsten contained in the ore, thinking perhaps there would be a change in that, and if there was a change in that, it would necessarily change the item now before the Senate, which is the metallic tungsten, tungsten powder, and tungstic acid; but with no change in the 45 per cent there will be no change in the other items named.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not proposing to offer any amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I shall not offer any amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is particularly interested in that feature of the paragraph, and he is unavoidably absent to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator from Nevada objects to the rates in the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my understanding. I do not think he has any objection to these rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure he has not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the assurance of the Senator, then, I will offer no objection to disposing of the matter now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that if the Senator from Nevada has any objection, when he returns to the Chamber I will ask for a reconsideration of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On the same page, line 17, it is proposed to strike out "15" and insert "25," so as to read:

and 25 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is on the same page, line 20, where it is proposed to strike out "72" and insert "60," so as to read:

ferrochromium tungsten, chromium tungsten, chromium cobalt tungsten, tungsten nickel, and all other alloys of tungsten not specially provided for, 60 cents per pound on the tungsten contained therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On the same page, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "17" and insert "25," so as to read:

and 25 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask now to take up paragraph 382, tinsel wire.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before we pass this paragraph, I observe that the compounds of chromium carry 30 per cent ad valorem, chrome being on the free list. They are found on page 50.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no change made in that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the rates here are fixed on the basis of free chrome, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Free chrome ore; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire of the Senator what were the considerations which induced the committee to put chrome ore on the free list?

Mr. SMOOT. The information that the committee had was that chrome ore was found only in a scattered condition in this country, and that the quality was very inferior to that which was imported from foreign countries; and not only that, but the users of it in this country state that it is not dependable, and therefore chrome ore was put upon the free list.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They made exactly the same representations concerning manganese, did they not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; in the case of manganese it was put upon the ground that there was not sufficient of it in the United States, but the question of quality was not involved.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The production of chrome ore did develop very largely during the war, did it not?

Mr. SMOOT. But it was at prices that nobody could think of paying in ordinary times. It was like other items that went twenty times as high as they were in normal times.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am interested in the thing not particularly so far as the tariff is concerned, but because of the reasoning upon which the item goes on the free list. The fact about the matter is that we are as fortunately situated in the State of Montana with respect to chrome ore as we are with respect to manganese. We can supply the world with chrome ore. There is no limit to the quantity we can produce, and, so far as quality is concerned, of a quality equal to that produced anywhere. It is a mere matter of the development of the industry; and it is simply a question of policy as to whether we shall make the steel manufacturers pay somewhat more for the chrome that they use in producing steel or whether we will allow it to lie undeveloped for some period, until conditions change and it becomes profitable to mine it; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. The industry has not been developed, and I do not remember anybody coming before the committee and asking for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is so. I have not heard very much from the Montana producers; but the ore is there in unlimited quantities.

Mr. SMOOT. Since the Senator brought up the question I have been trying to think whether or not anyone appeared before the committee on this subject, and I can not remember whether they did or not, but I do not believe they did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The properties most extensively developed are in the State of California, and I suppose that California has been rather in evidence in requesting these tariff rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not not want to say anything against the products of California, but I really must say that all that is produced in California is very unsatisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment of the committee in paragraph 382, on page 86.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to this paragraph. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina to follow the amendment that I have offered to paragraph 382, and if he does not understand it I will explain it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not seen it.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be read now from the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before it is read I want to ask the Senator from Utah why we can not now proceed with the sugar schedule and dispose of that finally.

Mr. SMOOT. All that we could dispose of would be the candy amendment. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] stated to me that he was going to leave the Chamber, as he had something to do, and that when we got through with these items he would ask to take up the other one, and I told him it would be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to state frankly to the Senator that I would rather not take up these items now. I will take up this first one, paragraph 382, if the Senator insists upon it; but there are three or four following that in the metal schedule that have been passed over that relate to zinc and lead ore and various ores, that I was under the impression that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had looked up and would present; but it seems that he and I misunderstood each other, and I am not now prepared to take those up. Of course, I can prepare myself as we go on, but it will take much more time than if the Senator will let them go over until I have had an opportunity to investigate them somewhat.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator will object to the action proposed in the case of paragraph 386, because we take tin bars off the dutiable list at 2 cents a pound, as the House provided for it, and put it on the free list. I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the Senator to the action of the committee on that item.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I would not ask that that particular item go over, because it is proposed to strike it out and put it somewhere else. When we get to the place where it is proposed to put it, I may want to consider it.

Mr. SMOOT. It goes on the free list.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it does, then I should make no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I knew that the Senator would not.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I was speaking about paragraph 382, and then the heavier items that follow that, such as paragraph 387, which relates to bottle caps of metal, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is prepared to go on now with paragraph 382, tinsel wire; is he not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask, then, that the amendment which I have sent to the desk may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 86, paragraph 382, following the numeral "382," is it proposed to strike out down to and including the words "ad valorem," leaving the semicolon, in line 18, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Tinsel wire, made wholly or in chief value of gold, silver, or other metal, 5 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem; lame or lahn, made wholly or in chief value of gold, silver, or other metal, 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem; bullions and metal threads made wholly or in chief value of tinsel wire, lame or lahn, 5 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in the rest of the paragraph there will be no changes made other than those that were made by the committee in the first instance.

Now perhaps it will be of interest to the Senator to know just what these changes are.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to have the Senator explain them.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I can explain them very briefly.

Tinsel wire, lame, and lahn, under the House provision and under other laws, have carried the same rate of duty. There should not be the same rate upon tinsel wire that there is upon lame and lahn. Therefore the committee has now decided to make a rate on tinsel wire, and then another rate upon lame or lahn, and a still further rate upon the bullions and metal thread made wholly or in chief value of tinsel wire, lame, or lahn.

The Senator will notice that in the first place we take tinsel wire and instead of placing a duty of 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem upon it, as the House has done, we impose upon it a duty of 5 cents a pound and 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is more than cutting it in two.

Mr. SMOOT. It is half of the specific duty, and only a third of the other. Then we take lame or lahn, and instead of having the duty 10 cents a pound and 30 per cent ad valorem we impose a duty of 5 cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is one-half in one case——

Mr. SMOOT. That is one-half of the specific duty, and two-thirds of the ad valorem.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then in the case of the bullions and metal threads, made wholly or in chief value of tinsel wire, lame or lahn, instead of 10 cents a pound and 35 per cent ad valorem we cut the specific duty in two, making it 5 cents a pound. That is a better classification, taking into consideration the labor that is put upon these articles.

Mr. SIMMONS. What rate does the Senator fix on bullions?

Mr. SMOOT. Five cents a pound and 35 per cent ad valorem. Those rates correspond with the rates imposed later in the bill as reported to the Senate. It is a very much better division. The House imposed a duty of 10 cents a pound and 30 per cent ad valorem on the tinsel wire, while they imposed only 55 per cent on the ribbons, fringes, and tassels made wholly or in chief value of any of the foregoing. There was no uniformity in the duties imposed, and as this amendment is offered it balances all the items in the paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator about the provision "not specially provided for," on line 22. It provides "woven fabrics, ribbons, fringes, and tassels made wholly or in chief value of any of the foregoing, 55 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. SMOOT. Those are all woven fabrics, and the others are not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Those are not changed?

Mr. SMOOT. No; those are not changed. Those are woven fabrics, and the Senator knows they are the highest type of fabrics.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am very much pleased that the committee has seen fit to so radically cut the House rates with reference, at least, to a part of the items contained in paragraph 382. It must be conceded with reference to these items that the imports are very heavy and the production in this country is light, most of the imports being from France.

So far as the duties reduced by the committee are concerned, I find that they are not materially different from the duties of the present law. They are slightly different, however; in some respects a little higher and in other respects somewhat lower.

I am afraid, however, that the rate imposed upon these products not specially provided for is higher than is justified, and upon the more highly finished products I think the duty of 55 per cent is too high. But those rates were not changed by the committee, and I suppose they are not subject to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the rates the committee has fixed are somewhat higher, but not very substantially higher, than the rates in the present law. The subsequent rates, with reference to which there is no proposed amendment and which will be open to amendment hereafter, I think are entirely too high.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that these articles are used by only a very few people, and the committee thought that anybody who could afford them could pay this rate of duty.

Mr. SIMMONS. We need not discuss that now. There is nothing before the Senate except the amendment, and I am ready for a vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 86, line 19, to strike out the word "ribbons" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire what item that is?

Mr. SMOOT. This is the tinsel wire, lame or lahn paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can vote on that. There are several amendments, but I will state to the Senator from Utah that the committee amendments in one instance reduce the rate to one-half the House rate and in the other instance to one-third of the House rate; then, in the next instance, to one-half the House rate and two-thirds of the House rate. By a comparison I have found they are not materially different from the rates in the present law, and I have no objection to them.

Mr. KING. While I have the floor, I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that on yesterday I mentioned to Mr. Walker and to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that I would be compelled to be absent from the Chamber most of the time to-day. The naval appropriation bill will be brought up to-morrow, and we may take several days in the discussion of it. I have not had a chance even to read it through. I asked as a favor that the schedules which I was to look after, involving certain metals, might be passed over to-day, and they assented to it.

Mr. SMOOT. That was as to zinc in blocks?

Mr. KING. Yes; and if those may go over, I would like to return to my office to resume the work which I am compelled to do with respect to the measure coming up to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow us to finish with these amendments?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in this connection, that I was under the impression that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] would look after those articles, but I find that it was the Senator from Utah instead of the Senator from Montana who has them in charge. I have not myself examined them, because I expected other Senators to look after them, and I shall be very glad if the Senator in charge of the bill will let those go over to accommodate the convenience of the junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Very well.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 86, line 20, after the word "wire" and the comma, to insert the words "metal thread" and a comma; on line 20, after the word "lahn" and the comma, to insert the words "or of tinsel wire, lame or lahn"; on line 23, after the word "fabrics," to insert the word "ribbons" and a comma; and on line 23, after the word "made," to insert the words "wholly or in chief value," so as to make the paragraph read:

PAR. 382. Tinsel wire, lame or lahn, made wholly or in chief value of gold, silver, or other metal, 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem; bullions and metal threads made wholly or in chief value of tinsel wire, lame or lahn, 10 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem; beltings, toys, and other articles made wholly or in chief value of tinsel wire, metal thread, lame or lahn, or of tinsel wire, lame or lahn and india rubber, bullions, or metal threads, not specially provided for, 45 per cent ad valorem; woven fabrics, ribbons, fringes, and tassels, made wholly or in chief value of any of the foregoing, 55 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that we now take up paragraph 386.

The amendment of the committee was, on page 87, beginning with line 15, to strike out paragraph 386, as follows:

PAR. 386. Tin in bars, blocks or pigs, and grain or granulated and scrap tin, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that in striking that out it is with a view of putting those articles on the free list and that this item will not reappear in some other dutiable section?

Mr. SMOOT. It will not. It goes to the free list, and is specifically provided for on the free list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now we can go to paragraph 504. Possibly we can find somebody present who will not ask that that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection. There is no amendment in that paragraph except striking out the words "or unmanufactured," and we might as well dispose of it.

The amendment was, on page 96, line 23, after the words "natural state," to strike out "or manufactured,"; so as to make the paragraph read:

PAR. 504. Maple sugar and maple sirup, 4 cents per pound; dextrose testing not above 99.7 per cent and dextrose sirup, 1½ cents per pound. Sugar cane in its natural state, $1 per ton of 2,000 pounds; sugar contained in dried sugar cane, or in sugar cane in any other than its natural state, 75 per cent of the rate of duty applicable to manufactured sugar of like polariscopic test.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are certain changes reported in paragraph 505 which are mere eliminations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The amendment was, on page 97, line 6, after the word "mannose," to strike out "melitzitose" and to insert "melezitose"; and in line 7, after the word "other," to strike out "of the higher saccharides required for scientific purposes" and to insert "saccharides"; so as to make the paragraph read:

PAR. 505. Adonite, arabinose, dulcite, galactose, inosite, inulin, levulose, mannite, d-talose, d-tagatose, ribose, meliblose, dextrose testing above 99.7 per cent, mannose, melezitose, raffinose, rhamnose, salicin, sorbite, xylose, and other saccharides, 50 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] desires to have the next paragraph passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum. We will see if I can not get that Senator here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	Nelson	Shortridge
Bursum	Hitchcock	Newberry	Simmons
Calder	Johnson	Nicholson	Smoot
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Spencer
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Culberson	Kendrick	Oddie	Swanson
Curtis	Keyes	Overman	Townsend
Dial	Ladd	Owen	Trammell
Dillingham	Lenroot	Phipps	Underwood
Edge	McCormick	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Elkins	McCumber	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	McKinley	Rawson	Willis
Fernald	McNary	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], I think, did not respond to the quorum call just now.

Mr. SIMMONS. He is on his way and will be here in a few minutes. I suggest, if the Senator has no objection, that we take up the tobacco schedule.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is not here, and he desires to be present when that paragraph is taken up.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I not suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that we might go to paragraph 601, wrapper tobacco? That is not the one in which the Senator from Connecticut is interested, I believe. I think it is paragraph 602 in which the Senator from Connecticut is especially interested.

Mr. McCUMBER. Paragraph 601 is wrapper tobacco.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the schedule in which certain wrapper tobacco is advanced from $2.10, the rate fixed by the House, to $2.35, the rate fixed by the Finance Committee. The House rates were about the same, I think, as those in the emergency tariff law, and all the Senate committee rates are higher. I do not think the other paragraphs are affected by the change in paragraph 601.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the committee have been a great deal more considerate of the convenience of the several Senators who desire to be present than those Senators have been of the convenience of the committee to dispose of the items in a somewhat logical order. We have yielded so much that it seems that no one is ready to take up a number of articles that ought to be disposed of before we reach the agricultural schedule. In all earnestness I want to plead with Senators that they be ready, after we get through with the naval appropriation bill, to go on with the consideration of the tariff bill. It is far more convenient for individual Senators to be prepared to take up a schedule when it is reached than it is for the committee, which must sit every morning preparing its work for the day, and then throw that work entirely aside to take up something that it has not considered as it desired to do before the final vote.

I will ask that we now go to the agricultural schedule, on page 99.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota if we have disposed of paragraph 375, metallic magnesium, which I asked the other day should go over?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; that has not been disposed of. There are some Senators who have asked that it may be passed over, and I have agreed to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that there has been a request also made as to what the price of the article really is to-day, not what it was last August, and that information is being collected for the committee and more than likely will be ready in a very short time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we can return to paragraph 701, Mr. President, we will give some consideration to the cattle, the sheep, and the goats.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment in Schedule 7 will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Schedule 7, agricultural products and provisions, paragraph 701, cattle, on page 99, lines 6 and 7, the committee proposes to strike out "less than 2 years old, 1 cent per pound; 2 years old or over, 1½ cents per pound," and insert "weighing less than 1,050 pounds each, 1½ cents per pound; weighing 1,050 pounds each or more, 2 cents per pound," so as to read:

Cattle weighing less than 1,050 pounds each, 1½ cents per pound; weighing 1,050 pounds each or more, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am sure a number of Senators desire to be heard upon this particular paragraph. One Senator was talking to me about it this morning. Of course, we have reached the paragraph rather unexpectedly, and the Senators who are interested in the whole schedule generally are out of the Chamber. I make the point of no quorum so that I may have them called in and notified that the agricultural schedule is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	Lenroot	Shortridge
Borah	Ernst	McCumber	Simmons
Broussard	Fernald	McNary	Smoot
Bursum	Gerry	Nelson	Spencer
Calder	Harris	Newberry	Sterling
Cameron	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Swanson
Capper	Johnson	Norbeck	Townsend
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Wadsworth
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Kellogg	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Kendrick	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Dillingham	Keyes	Rawson	Willis
Edge	Ladd	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just before the call for a quorum the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] entered the Chamber. He now desires to go on with the paragraph relating to confectionery, and I therefore ask that we may return to that paragraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GERRY. Does the Sentaor from North Dakota desire to have considered the amendments in paragraphs 504 and 505?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments to paragraphs 504 and 505 have been agreed to. The Secretary will state the committee amendments in paragraph 506.

The READING CLERK. On page 97, in paragraph 506, line 10, before the word "sugar," the Committee on Finance proposes to strike out the word "on."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same paragraph, on page 97, line 11, before the words "per cent," to strike out "30" and insert "40," so as to read:

PAR. 506. Sugar candy and all confectionery not specially provided for, and sugar after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 97, paragraph 506, line 11, I move to strike out "40" and to insert in lieu thereof "23."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 97, paragraph 506, line 11, before the words "per cent," it is proposed to strike out the numeral "40" and to insert in lieu thereof the numeral "23," so as to read:

or in any way adulterated, 23 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, this paragraph differs from the similar paragraph in the Underwood-Simmons law of 1913. Under that law on candy valued at 15 cents per pound or less the rate was 2 cents per pound; if valued at more than 15 cents a pound, the rate was 25 per cent ad valorem. Under the bill as it comes to us from the other House all candy and confectionery is proposed to be admitted at a flat rate of 30 per cent ad valorem, that rate, of course, being based on American valuation. The bill as reported by the Senate committee proposes a rate of 40 per cent ad valorem, foreign valuation, which would be a lower duty. For the higher grades the rates are ad valorem, both in the pending bill and in the Underwood-Simmons law. Under the Underwood-Simmons law the rates were 25 per cent as against 30 per cent as proposed in the House bill. I think it is only fair to say, though, that in the House bill the rate, as I have stated, is based on the American valuation and is, therefore, compared to the 25 per cent ad valorem rate of the Underwood law, considerably higher than the mere difference in percentage would indicate.

Mr. President, as nearly as I can figure it, the duty of 2 cents per pound is equivalent practically to 23 and a fraction per cent, as against 40 per cent proposed by the Senate Finance Committee.

The Tariff Summary shows that the products of the establishments engaged in the manufacture of confectionery are valued at $447,800,000. The exports increased during the war from $1,200,000 to an annual average of $1,800,000. The imports for 1918, the table which I hold in my hand shows, were valued at about $27,000; in 1919 they were valued at $195,000; in 1920 they were valued at $371,000; and in 1921 they were valued at $122,000. I submit that an industry such as this, the exports of which so largely exceed in value its imports from any source, needs no such protection. The industry is well on its feet; it has a tremendous market within the country, and to impose such a duty on the commodity as this simply means to give the domestic producer an additional advantage and an opportunity to charge the general public more. I think the figures are so clear that it is unnecessary to say anything more on the schedule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee may be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 97, paragraph 506, line 11, before the words "per cent" the Committee on Finance proposes to strike out the numeral "30" and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "40." The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] proposes to insert in lieu of the numeral "40" the numeral "23," so that the paragraph will read:

PAR. 506. Sugar candy and all confectionery not specially provided for, and sugar after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 23 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when this question came up. I have proposed an amendment to paragraph 506. I do not think at this time the amendment would be in order; but I wish to make a brief statement.

In this instance there is no reason to reduce the duty proposed by the committee, because the duty proposed by the committee is totally inadequate. It will be observed, of course, that under paragraph 501, which is not proposed to be amended by the Finance Committee, there is a duty proposed of 1 16/100 cents per pound on all sugar testing not above 75 degrees, and for each additional sugar degree shown by the polariscopic test, four one-hundredths of 1 per cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion. If paragraph 506 were to be permitted to remain as the committee has reported it, it would make it possible, by merely coloring sugar with a harmless substance, to import it on a basis of 40 per cent ad valorem and escape the duty imposed by paragraph 501 upon sugar.

I wish also to state at this time that the words "and sugar after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated," have never been applied to any previous rate on sugar or candy, and I believe that they have been incorporated in paragraph 506 without the committee ever realizing the import of the words proposed.

As I have stated before, even under a tariff for revenue bill it was never intended that any sugar merely because of being colored or adulterated with some other substance should be imported here at a lower rate of duty than that imposed on sugar itself. There have been, however, in previous acts duties corresponding to the now proposed duty on sugar, candy, and confectionery.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. If I understand the Senator's contention correctly, he is not objecting so much to the rate I offer with respect to sugar candy and confectionery, but the objection is that sugar may come in under this amendment?

Mr. BROUSSARD. That was my great objection; but at the same time, when a certain rate of duty is imposed on a basic article, we should try in a fair way to put a compensatory duty on the product manufactured from the basic article in order to protect that product, and I am not yet satisfied that 40 per cent is adequate when it is considered that the intention of the framers of the bill is to put a duty of 2 cents a pound on sugar. If 2 cents a pound on sugar is considered a reasonable rate—so far as I am concerned it is not a reasonable rate, because I want a larger rate if I can get it, and I expect to try to get it——

Mr. CARAWAY. We will compromise on one.

Mr. BROUSSARD. We do not have to compromise on one, because that is the Democratic rate; but 40 per cent, I think, would not compare with a 2-cent rate per pound on sugar, because there is some candy that has had no labor added, just a little ribbonlike coloration around it, and is then introduced into the country. If the 2-cent rate be finally agreed to in this bill, that 2 cents compared to the cost of production in Cuba would be 100 per cent tariff, and a 40 per cent rate on candy would not be adequate to protect; and if I had any complaint to offer about that I would make it 50 per cent as a minimum, anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On lines 12, 13, and 14 it is proposed to strike out:

The value of the immediate coverings other than the outer packing case or other covering shall be included in the dutiable value of the merchandise.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask now that we return to paragraph 503; and I will state to the Senator from Louisiana that we ought now to agree to the amendment in paragraph 503 striking out "sirups" and putting in "sugar sirups, not specially provided for"——

Mr. BROUSSARD. What page is that?

Mr. SMOOT. That is on page 96; and that will clean up all of the committee amendments in this schedule.

I will ask that the committee amendment be agreed to now.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is the "sugar sirups, not specially provided for"?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; because this will be the result: I should like to have it cleaned up, and then when we reach the sirups that have already been placed upon the free list if that is not agreed to we can offer an amendment to reject this one, but let us clean up this schedule now as far as the committee amendments are concerned.

Mr. BROUSSARD. With the understanding that if this is agreed to, it will not prejudice——

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that it will not, because when the bill reaches the Senate any kind of amendment can be offered to it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then if, when we reach paragraph 1615a, that is not agreed to——

Mr. SMOOT. Then this would not amount to anything anyhow, because it would not be provided for anywhere else.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I merely wanted to put it so we may have the understanding in the RECORD that if we should disagree to paragraph 1615a then of course the committee would support the cancellation of this.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then I have no objection to the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to returning to paragraph 503? The Chair hears none. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In paragraph 503, on page 96, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "sirups" and insert "sugar sirups, not specially provided for," so as to make the paragraph read:

PAR. 503. Molasses and sugar sirups, not specially provided for, testing not above 48 per cent total sugars, twenty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per gallon; testing above 48 per cent total sugars, two hundred and seventy-five one-thousandths of 1 cent additional for each per cent of total sugars and fractions of a per cent in proportion.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, this paragraph, 503, has a different wording and is based on a different test from that in the Underwood bill. Under this bill, the test is on total sugars. Under the Underwood bill and under all former bills, as I understand, the test was a polariscopic one. Possibly it might clear up some of the debate that took place yesterday and today to show the difference that that makes in the report of the sugar content.

I shall read from the hearings, where there is a table on page 2356 in which it is shown that sucrose by polariscope ranged from 22 to 23 per cent as compared with sucrose by the Clerget method, which would average between 32 and 40 per cent. Reducing sugars would be between 14 and 28 per cent, and total sugars by polariscope would be from 40 to 54 per cent, as compared to total sugars by the Clerget method between 48 and 62 per cent.

As we are only considering now the committee amendments, I shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussing this paragraph more fully, or in offering amendments. I am entirely in favor of what the committee proposes in the amendment now before us, where it says "molasses and sugar sirups not specially provided for," and then it provides in paragraph 1615a that molasses testing above 56 per cent total sugars not imported to be commercially used for extraction of sugar, or for human consumption, shall be put on the free list.

Mr. President, this was done so that the makers of cattle feed should have the advantage of receiving the molasses that was used in that feed free of duty, and I presume with the idea of doing something for the farmers. Molasses has done much to build up cattle feed, and to help the farmer both to fatten his stock and to produce greater quantities of milk. I know that in my own State it is very largely used by farmers in feeding their cows, and that it is really one of the necessities of farm feed. The use of this blackstrap molasses really acts not only as a fattener but also as an appetizer for the cattle.

While I am very heartily in favor of doing this for the farmer, it does seem to me that there is somewhat of a paradox in the bill, because while the farmer is allowed this advantage in order to have the feed for his cattle made lower by the molasses that his cattle get entering free, yet if he wants to use the molasses himself on his own table he must pay a duty.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GERRY. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. BROUSSARD. In the Senator's last remark, is he criticizing the committee for permitting molasses to be used for human consumption to come in under a tax, while giving it to cattle free?

Mr. GERRY. I was just calling attention to that fact.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Now, coming back to the statement which the Senator has just made, that some of the people in his State are interested in having this blackstrap molasses come in free, are they dairy people, or are they feeders?

Mr. GERRY. They are dairymen.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Do they want to have their butter and their other dairy products put in competition with the world and have no duty placed against them?

Mr. GERRY. Personally, I do not think duty on butter will have the effect in my State of increasing the profit to the farmer, and undoubtedly this will be true in other States.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senator believes it will not?

Mr. GERRY. I do.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then, does the Senator think that those who are asking that feedstuffs be put in open competition with the world are advocating that their own products be placed in open competition with the world?

Mr. GERRY. I do not think I get the Senator's question.

Mr. BROUSSARD. In other words, are the dairy people who would like to have blackstrap molasses come in free willing and asking that their own products of the dairy be put in open competition with the world?

Mr. GERRY. I can not speak for the dairy people of the country. I do not know what they are asking. The Senator from Rhode Island is speaking simply his own views.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But the Senator from Rhode Island will concede that if the dairy people want a protection for their dairy products, they should be willing to accord a very small protection to the people who grow the feed with which they feed their stock and produce these dairy products.

Mr. GERRY. I think that is a question for the dairy people to answer, and involves a discussion of the whole theory of protection, and on this question the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Louisiana differ so much in their ideas of the principle upon which this bill is based that I am afraid we would not get a meeting of the minds.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I was not trying to elicit the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island on this particular question. I was simply trying to get his judgment as to whether or not a dairyman who wants to have his products protected should ask for free materials to convert into the products which he wants protected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe we are now brought to the consideration of the agricultural schedule.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	Myers	Smoot
Broussard	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Bursum	Hitchcock	Newberry	Sterling
Calder	Johnson	Nicholson	Sutherland
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Townsend
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Underwood
Caraway	Kellogg	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Ladd	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Edge	Lenroot	Pomerene	Willis
Ernst	McCormick	Sheppard
Fernald	McCumber	Shortridge
Gerry	McNary	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, every day or so the precious hours which ought to be employed in a just and fair discussion of the items on which duties have been levied in this bill have been spent in reading into the RECORD editorials from those papers which represent the importing industries of the country. I have been requested by the committee to meet the arguments which have been made by the press. So far we have kept silent as to the profits that are made by the great importing houses of the country and those who are now so strenuously engaged in attempting to destroy the purposes of the bill.

I have before me upon the desk a number of articles. I shall have occasion to show what is paid for those articles in foreign countries and what the American consumer is charged for the same articles in the United States; but before I do that I want to lay the foundation for the presentation of some of these matters, and I, or perhaps other members of the committee, will present a number of other articles. I think we have now in our possession between two and three hundred of them, and we will try to select those articles used most commonly by the American people.

If those editorial pages presented any real argument on any one of the items under discussion we might excuse the verbosity of their long essays. But while they criticize and condemn, not one of them attempts to really analyze a single item in this bill.

The time spent by some of them in cussing the chairman because he fails to be the representative of New York, or what they denominate the great financial interests of the country, it seems to me might be spent to better advantage. The chairman of the committee is but 1 of the 16 members who constitute the Finance Committee, and but 1 of the 10 Republican members who, of course, assume the responsibility of presenting what the American people by their decisive vote in 1920 demanded that we should present.

On the Republican side of the committee I think it can truthfully be said that there is represented every view, from the very lowest tariff that could be called a protective tariff at all to a very high protective policy. And if those papers desire to eliminate what influence the chairman, coming from a purely agricultural section of the country, may have in the determination of tariff schedules—if they feel that his life and business have not brought him into sufficiently close contact with what they consider the great financial interest of the country—and they seem to think that the banking and the importing interests are about all that need to be considered—I think I can most properly call their attention to the fact that the Republican side is still splendidly represented in this Finance Committee by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], all representatives of both the great manufacturing and the importing interests of the East; by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], representing great mining and manufacturing interests; by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], all representing agricultural States. And I would like to ask these papers, these representatives of the great department stores which are so deeply interested in importations, if it would be possible for them to select any group of representatives who could better represent all the divers interests of the United States—manufacturing, agricultural, mining, and every other industry—than those who constitute the Republican side of the Finance Committee?

These papers know as well as I do that the interests of New York and New Jersey, of Pennsylvania, of Pittsburgh, and Chicago are represented not only by some of the most able Senators in the Senate but also by those who are well acquainted with every great financial and industrial interest. The inconsistency of this so-called Republican press is that while it supports these Senators as able representatives of their States, it nevertheless, at the behest of these great importing interests, condemns the very men it supports as its representatives. More than this, while it ardently supports the President of the United States, it assails those policies for which he stands and which he reasserts on every occasion.

The great metropolitan press of the country has it in its power to do very much to bring about a revival of business in the United States. It has it in its power to do very much to destroy American industry, upon which alone such revival must be predicated. And when it stops to recall that more than 90 per cent of all our trade is trade with each other it ought to recognize the importance of sustaining all of our American industries, to the end that each and every individual shall have profitable employment to enable him to purchase the product of his neighbor, and that none of them can have that profitable employment if the foreigner is allowed to supply an undue proportion of the American trade or if in order to maintain our home markets with each other we must reduce the wages of employees to more closely approach the wages of the foreign labor.

So I have asked these papers to furnish the committee with real facts and figures to demonstrate that it has made a rate too high or too low, or that its compensatory duties have not been worked out with proper mathematical precision.

I can assure them that if they will send anything to the committee to demonstrate that it has made an error, the committee will be more than pleased to give further consideration to the rate of duty on any item in this bill. We not only have had in the consideration of this bill the assistance of the most able of our Senators, some of whom I am certain are far better equipped with general information on tariff matters than any of these newspaper critics, but we have also had with us during all the period of our investigation and even up to the present time the assistance of the very best tariff experts the departments could furnish us, the very best information that the Tariff Commission could give us. Among those experts we have had those of the Democratic as well as of the Republican faith. They have furnished us with facts, figures, and estimates, and their calculations, when called for, have always been made with mathematical accuracy, irrespective of political belief. There has never been any disagreement among these experts on the facts in any case, and I submit to the Senate and to the country in all good faith, Is not the careful and deliberate judgment, based upon such unbiased evidence by Senators representing every section of the country, more reliable than the mere capricious condemnation of those whose opinion must be colored by the interest of those from whom they receive their revenues?

If these metropolitan papers want to be fair to the American people, I invite them to take a hundred or more of the leading articles which are imported into the United States in competition with comparable articles manufactured in the United States; let them put in one column just what the great department store pays for these articles in a foreign country and what it sells them for at retail in this country, with its percentage of profit, and in another column just what it costs the American manufacturer, with his higher wages, ranging often from five to ten times as much as the foreign wages, and what he sells his product for in the American market, with his percentage of profit.

While it is true that such a table would astonish the American public, it is equally certain to my mind that it would convert them all into ardent protectionists. They would insist that the importer who purchases an article for $1 abroad and forces them to pay him $10 for that article should at least pay the Government 50 cents for this privilege of fleecing the people out of $8.50.

I am not condemning or criticizing people because they want to buy an article as cheaply as they can and sell it at as big a profit as possible. That is a part of our selfish human nature. But I do think they ought not to use their influence over the press in a vicious fight to destroy the American manufacturer, whose profits on the turnover are not one-tenth of what the importers receive.

I have here on my desk some of the advertisements appearing in a New York paper. I pick up as a fair illustration the New York Herald of May 4, 1922, and I find in big headlines this advertisement:

> An extraordinary sale of $12,000 worth of English luggage at liberal savings—the remaining stock on hand of an importer about to retire from business. Every piece is perfect and of a quality that will appeal especially to those who have a penchant for fine luggage.

Here is a cut of an imported English suit case, a very plain-looking case, with a checked lining. Underneath the cut we find the following: "Regularly $40," but it is to be sold at a great reduction—at $25.95. Of course, they do not say what they paid for this suit case. I know that but a very few years ago you could buy at retail in the West such a case for about $6, and that is assuming that it was made of all leather, made of "tough bull hide found in the pit where the tanner died." You can make a fair guess of about what the wholesale price of this suit case must have been in England. They say they have been selling it for $40.

Mr. President, a short time ago I leased a neat eight-room, two-story dwelling house in my home town for $40 per month, $480 a year. On account of recent paving, I paid a tax and insurance of about $345. That left me $135. So for a whole year's rent of this little home I could become the proud possessor of three of these imported suit cases. And the house that imposes that outrageous charge against the American consumer—that probably sold that suit case for $30 more than it paid for it—is damning a Republican Congress because it dare suggest that they should pay a dollar or two import duty.

I find that kit bags of the same material were selling regularly at from $40 to $45. I wish that the American purchasing public could cast their eyes upon the invoiced price of this suit case and this bag. Mr. President, I have before me some evidence along this line, and in the light of such evidence your 30 per cent ad valorem and your 60 per cent ad valorem will be as a gnat to an elephant compared with the mighty percentage which measures the scale of difference between the importing and selling prices of these articles and which the American people pay.

Now, when such enormous profits are made and when the American public is paying for these enormous profits, are we committing a crime if we say that the American importer shall pay a few pennies or a few nickels out of such immense profits for the right to make these profits in the United States?

I have here an advertisement from the Boston Herald advertising imported articles. It states that these articles are imported from Hungary, Switzerland, France, Ireland, Italy, Belgium, England, Porto Rico, Japan, Czechoslovakia. You can imagine at what prices these articles were purchased in Czechoslovakia, where men receive from 10 to 20 cents a day and women from 40 to 60 cents a week. We know that because of the condition in that country everything is produced at a lower cost than ever before; and then when we measure these wonderful retail prices of to-day with what they were before the war in this country, we can get some idea of the mighty profits of this importer.

Recently there came into my hands a letter sent by B. Russell Herts, president of the Herts Bros. Co., of New York, in regard to a European antique furniture pool. Mr. Herts, according to this letter, is now in Europe making purchases for this pool. These are to be sold to the American public in October at such inflated prices that the speculators and investors in the pool are assured 300 per cent profit within six months. I am going to quote just two paragraphs of this letter.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right at that point?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I would like to have this matter condensed, and if he would just as soon defer his question I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. Herts says:

> As examples of purchases that have been made abroad during the past six months which have afforded unusual profits, we may recite the experience of one dealer from New York who found a number of beaded bags in Berlin which he purchased for 25 marks each, or about 10 cents, which were afterwards sold in this country for $15 each.

Think of it, Mr. President, a beaded bag purchased for 10 cents and retailed in this country by the importer for $15, an increase of 15,000 per cent. And these are the men who are condemning this tariff bill because it seeks to provide that the man who makes those enormous profits, the man who buys a beaded bag for 10 cents and sells it for $15, shall pay 6 cents import duty.

Let me read the next paragraph:

> In the line of interior decorations is the purchase of various articles, such as ormolu mounted commodes, which cost $25 in Europe and were retailed for $250 in this country. The duty on such articles, if modern, is only 15 per cent, and if antique nothing at all. Similarly, tapestries have been brought to this country without duty and sold at more than ten times their initial cost.

Could not the great metropolitan papers do more for the interest of the American people if they would use their columns in calling attention to these colossal frauds against the Treasury and against the people of the country than by condemning the attempt of Congress to collect a very small sum as duty upon these imported articles to meet the demands which are being made every day upon the American Treasury?

This letter, Mr. President, discloses in a nutshell one of the reasons for opposing this tariff bill. Mr. Herts is only one among hundreds of importers who are to-day spending millions of dollars in Europe buying everything from toys to antiques, paying for them in the cheap, depreciated paper currencies of Europe, and selling them at enormous profits to the American consumer—buying beaded bags, for example, which cost 10 cents in Berlin and are resold in New York for $15.

With such profits is it any wonder that the great importing interests of New York and Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia should be spending vast sums of money in propaganda to defeat tariff legislation?

Is it not astonishing, under these circumstances, that the Democratic Members of the Senate, who allege that they are opposed to huge profits, should be defending these importing interests? They talk about an excess-profits tax. Here is the place to find the excess profits and here is the place to tax them.

Republican Members of the Senate who are striving to enact an American tariff bill to protect American workers and American industries are fighting this battle for the American producer. We want a tariff which will at least lessen this enormous profiteering in foreign merchandise. What manufacturer in the United States to-day is making 300 per cent within six months on anything he produces? What manufacturer is making 15,000 per cent on a single turnover?

The line between the friends and opponents of the pending tariff measure is sharply drawn. On our side are Senators who believe in protecting and safeguarding America first. We stand for American prosperity, despite the campaign of the opposition to delay tariff legislation for the benefit of Europe and Asia and the remainder of the world and a few hundred importers.

The great metropolitan newspapers to-day are attacking this bill because their prosperity, for the moment, depends upon the prosperity of their advertisers, and their advertisers are making fortunes buying cheaply abroad and selling at tremendously high prices to the American consumer. The more they make the more avaricious they grow; and so they are damning the tariff because it seeks to secure a penny out of a dollar of their huge profits, just as they are damning what they call the bonus bill because it means a little tax.

Last year, according to the business manager of the New York Times, advertisers spent $700,000,000 in advertising in the daily and weekly newspapers of the United States. Most of this money was spent by the large department stores in the larger cities. One department store in Detroit alone spent $600,000 with three Detroit newspapers last year. In New York City the department stores spend even larger sums. And they are all heavy importers.

And what do they advertise? I call attention to an advertisement in the New York Herald of some time ago. It reads:

> All over the world, in little far-away villages in the Tyrol, in quiet corners of Bruges and Brussels, in the highlands of Scotland, and in the workrooms of the Rue de la Paix, men and women and girls are busy every day making lovely things for women here in New York.

The advertisement then goes on to say that—

> This store is the gateway through which these lovely things will pass, and through which, in return, will pass money that buys food and clothes and life for the people who are at work in Europe.

Now, notice—

> It is a romantic and fascinating business this, a business that brings happiness and content to those who make things for us and satisfaction to those who buy from us.

How romantic it is, Mr. President, to force a little child, whose tiny fingers have worked possibly for three weeks to make a little beaded bag over in the Tyrol, to accept, because of its half-starved condition, 10 cents for that bag! Ah, truly, Mr. President, it is romantic. And how fascinating it is to sell that bag to the American women for $15. Ah, indeed, it is a fascinating business!

Why, then, do the New York and Boston newspapers attack the tariff bill? Why do they print articles and editorials to deceive the American people? Why do those responsible for the propaganda throw upon the moving-picture screens falsehoods, stating that tariff duties are based on the retail prices, which are from 100 per cent to 15,000 per cent greater than the foreign prices upon which the duties are levied?

In the case of the metropolitan press it is because their life-blood depends upon the revenue from their big advertisers, and their big advertisers depend for their prosperity upon the cheapness with which they can buy abroad and the high prices they can get in the American market from the American consumer.

A short time ago my colleague, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] exposed the untruthful propaganda of the Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune that the tariff on hides would increase the cost of shoes $2 per pair. The New York Tribune published on its first page deliberate—because I can not conceive that they did not know better—misstatements of facts about the hide schedule and its effect upon the price of shoes. The junior Senator from North Dakota exposed and nailed these misstatements, but not one word of his reply appeared in the New York Tribune. Do the Senate or the American public need any greater proof than this that the New York newspapers are afraid to publish the truth when it hits their advertisers or their advertisers' interests?

Now, Mr. President, this is not true of the great majority of newspapers in the United States. This campaign of misrepresentation against the tariff is centered in the big cities, where the importers' advertisements dominate the newspapers. But the thousands of daily and weekly newspapers throughout the country whose prosperity depends upon American prosperity—the newspapers which serve and inform the great mass of Americans—are not thus influenced, as is evidenced by their impartial handling of tariff news and their fair editorials.

The great reservoir of democracy in this country lies in the small cities and on the farms. These people are not misled by the importers' propaganda. They know what it means. They understand the system by which the importing houses bring in foreign goods and sell at high prices in the big cities and dump the surplus into the mail-order houses. The farmers and merchants in the small towns of this country know that there is a gulf that separates the prosperity of their communities from the prosperity of those who can buy abroad in cheap money and sell in 100-cent dollars to the American consumer.

The little country merchant is compelled to buy much of his stock from these large importing stores. They sell to him for a small discount below the retail price. He gets no benefit from the cheap prices paid abroad, and if there be a surplus of these articles the country merchant finds that this surplus is being catalogued and sold in competition with him in his own territory; and if he would inform himself he would find that in many instances what are called seconds—defective products—are purchased, catalogued, and sold under his very nose.

Mr. President, I am not a pessimist; neither am I a blind optimist; but I would consider myself blind indeed if I failed to recognize any danger to our American industries, any danger to our national welfare, in the stupendous wealth and power of the great department stores of the country. We decry loudly the growth, development, and power of the gigantic industrial concerns of this country. But, Mr. President, these industries have employed, and still employ, American capital in America. These industries have given profitable employment to millions upon millions of American citizens. These industries have made America great and prosperous; but the great department stores have found of late years that they can double and treble their profits if they can purchase abroad, and so one department store can go abroad and purchase the entire year's output of a foreign factory. With their ready cash in millions they can drive a bargain more exacting than the most avaricious dreams of a Shylock. They are rapidly dispensing with the service of the old-time importer and saving the 33⅓ per cent commission and overhead charges of the importer.

The public has never yet received any corresponding benefits because of these cheap purchases abroad. The department-store importer has so far not attempted to drive out of business his little, tiny brother merchant in the large city, who must pay from 40 to 60 per cent more for his goods. He is not much of a competitor; and being compelled to sell his merchandise at a higher price because of higher costs, the department store is enabled to sell at the same price and thereby amass a mighty fortune because of the cheaper purchases.

I want to say to the great manufacturing industries of the country, those which are not specially favored like the iron and steel business, but those which must meet European and Asiatic conditions at a great disadvantage, "This is your battle for your life!" I want to say to every laborer employed by these industries, "This is your battle. Every dollars' worth of products purchased from abroad displaces about $3 worth of the like products of your labor."

With every metropolitan paper, the mouthpiece of the importer who buys its advertising pages, the very foundation of the temple of protection is being undermined by this insidious propaganda. Not only are they now using the press of the country but they are also using the movies to impress their falsehoods upon the public. They well know that, as a rule, it is not necessary to add a single penny to the selling price of the article imported and sold by them. They know that they could absorb the tariff many times over and still receive an unconscionable profit. They know that this tariff is not a tax upon the consumer, and that it is but a meager tax upon the importer.

Mr. President, after these importers began their propaganda work, I asked the services of the Treasury Department through the customs branch of that department to get at the actual cost of imported articles in general use—just what they were imported at. These same articles were purchased from the stores importing them and receipts taken for the purchase price. Every article was examined and identified by the customs appraisers; and I am going to present to the Senate and to the country, so far as I can, a partial view of the most astounding profits reaped by those who have organized themselves into a propaganda, and who are now seeking to strike to death the American industries, that they may continue to amass their mighty fortunes. I am going to take these articles just as they come to me.

This cuckoo clock, which seems to be in the way, I will take first and get it out of the way. I am not going to state here from whom the purchases were made, although I have the receipts; but the foreign cost of that clock was 94 cents, and it was purchased here at retail for $22.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much?

Mr. McCUMBER. Twenty-two dollars. It cost 94 cents.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would rather go through with these articles, but if the Senator insists I will yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should just like to ask the Senator if he is going to give the names of those profiteers to the Attorney General, who was out hunting profiteers the other day?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know of any way in which the Attorney General can reach the retail store that imports for a few cents and sells for a big price.

Mr. CARAWAY. He was spending a lot of money looking up the American profiteer and the retail merchant, and I thought he knew some way to reach these people.

Mr. McCUMBER. All that the Attorney General will have to do will be to read the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senator declines to give the names.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have the names of the parties here.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator turn them over to the Attorney General?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say here that never in my life have I made any kind of an argument personal, and I do not desire to criticize this store or that one. I have the name of the store importing, and the receipt from that store; but that is not what I am trying to present here. I am endeavoring to show the immense profits and what the tariff means.

If the Senate will listen to me again, the foreign cost of that cuckoo clock was 94 cents. It is invoiced at that price. The retail price was $22. There was a spread of $21.06 on an article costing 94 cents. The percentage of spread was 2,240 per cent. The Senate duty upon that clock would be 50 per cent ad valorem, and taking the 50 per cent from the 2,240 per cent would still leave the importer 2,190 per cent to cover his overhead charges and the cost of landing and profit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems obvious, then, that the evil must be reached in some other way than by the tariff.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I am trying to show here is not the matter of the tariff; I am trying to show that these importers, using the great press of the country to condemn this tariff, are reaping enormous benefits and do not want to pay into the Treasury a penny out of their profits. That is all I am trying to show.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to ask, after I answer this question—I will answer this one—that I may be allowed to finish, as it will take some time. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wanted to ask just the significance of these items as we go along. I wanted to inquire what is the extent of the importation of these cuckoo clocks, and what is the amount of production in this country?

Mr. McCUMBER. How many?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I do not know. Of course, there are a great many here. You see them in practically every store. All I wanted to get at was the price.

Now, if Senators will allow me, I will go on with this.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I will yield once more.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said that clock was sold in America for $22.

Mr. McCUMBER. It can be bought for $22.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can the Senator tell me the price of a comparable clock produced in this country and sold in this market?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know. I am not interested in that in this connection. It may be that it costs an American $4, and it may be that it costs him $15; I do not know. I am not now seeking to decide what this particular duty would be, but to show that the duty is such that the importer can well pay it and still have left an enormous profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to know whether the Senator meant to argue that the foreign article is sold in the American market at a higher price than the comparable domestic article.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know whether it is or not. I assume that if they can get an American article at a very much cheaper price than this it would sell in the place of this article, but I do not know. There is a general belief that an imported article is always better, and people will often pay a higher price for it. What I want to show is that, after paying the duty provided in this bill, the importer will still have 2,190 per cent to cover his overhead expenses and his profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not let me finish my inquiry——

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would allow me to go on. I have asked him to do so as a matter of courtesy, and I hope he will.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, if the Senator does not wish me to finish the line of inquiry I was pursuing I will not do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have asked that. I would try to answer the inquiry but it takes time.

I have in my hand now a beautiful little article, not a pearl necklace, but I believe the stone is called the Tecla pearl.

It has a good name in the United States, and women pay a pretty good price for it. This identical Tecla pearl necklace was imported from France for $12.25. It was purchased at retail, I think from the importer, for $150. It cost $12.25; it sold for $150. I do not know whether they threw in the box or not.

There was a spread of $137.75. The percentage of spread was 1,124 per cent. The Senate committee duty upon that, coming in at that price, would have been 60 per cent. In other words, the man who imported that article for $12.25 and sold it for $150, would have been compelled to pay into the Treasury of the United States the enormous sum of $7.35, and because we would exact that sum of him he wants to destroy this vicious bill. But that left a balance, after paying 60 per cent, of 1,064 per cent for the importer to live on.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator if he will not let me finish without further interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator declines to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have asked that three or four times.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand; but it was a very modest question I wanted to ask.

Mr. McCUMBER. However, the Senator is always so pleading that I am going to listen to him.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I just want to ask if the Senator has the names of the purchasers of those articles?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Would he mind giving them to the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not desire to do that. If any Senator desires he can get the name of the party who made the purchase, the store from which it was purchased, the invoice, and the receipt, so that he can get all the facts in connection with the matter; but there is no use bringing in the names of stores, and importers, and so on, except to say that we have carefully guarded against any possible mistake.

I will take these samples as they lie here before me. Here is an article the duty on which we discussed a short time ago. Here are a half dozen tableknives, the ordinary kitchen tableware, with solid handles. Senators think it is imposing upon the housewife when we put a duty upon these articles; but let us see whether the importer imposes upon her in any way.

The cost of each of these is 2.75 cents. The retail price is 30 cents each. The spread is 27¼ cents. The profit is 991 per cent. The spread would be 752 per cent. That would give a balance of 239 per cent. The duty on this is 45 per cent ad valorem.

I have here a barber's clipper, used in all the barber shops of the country. We place a duty upon it. According to the invoice we have, this article was imported for 13 cents. It retails at 85 cents. That leaves a profit of 554 per cent. The duty is 20 cents each and 32 per cent ad valorem, and still the importer would have a profit after paying all duties of 350 per cent.

Another article is linen napkins. These have yet to be cut apart. The foreign cost was $12.20 per dozen. They are retailed at $65 per dozen. It is good linen, and the napkins retail at $65 per dozen upon a cost of $12.20 per dozen. That leaves a spread of $52.80 a dozen. The percentage of spread is 432 per cent. The Senate duty is 50 per cent ad valorem, which would still leave after paying the little 50 per cent ad valorem 382 per cent for profit and overhead charges.

This is an ordinary globe, which we use for electric lights, an electric-light bulb, I presume, of the quality used in our homes. The foreign cost of that is 5.3 cents. The retail price is 30 cents. The spread, therefore, is about 25 cents, and that leaves a spread for profit of 477 per cent. The Senate duty is 45 per cent ad valorem, which would still leave the importer 432 per cent profit to cover his overhead expenses.

Those people who are calling for an excess-profits tax I would ask, Is not this profit sufficiently excessive to merit your serious consideration?

Here is a little watch, silver backed, I think. I do not know whether it is bought by the gross or by the piece. The foreign cost is a dollar, and it is retailed in this country for $9.45. The spread, therefore, is $8.45, and the profit, of course, would be 845 per cent. The Senate duty on that is high, 130 per cent. But after taking the 130 per cent from 845 per cent we are still leaving the importer 715 per cent, and that ought to satisfy him.

Here is a pair of lady's gloves. If we go to Chicago and New York we would find in all the large retail stores ladies taking signatures of other ladies to protest against the awful imposition upon American women of a tariff upon these kid gloves. The foreign cost of this pair of kid gloves was 27½ cents. It seems to be a good pair of gloves. The retail price is $2. There is a spread of $1.72, or 627 per cent profit. I would be pleased to have the lady who takes the names of these women who are protesting present to those women a statement of the profit made by these stores, which import an article for 27½ cents and charge them $2.

Mr. CALDER. What is the duty on them?

Mr. McCUMBER. The duty is 70 per cent, and that still leaves them 55 per cent profit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is 70 per cent on the importing price.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; 70 per cent on the importing price, of course.

Mr. CALDER. That is a duty of only 14 cents.

Mr. McCUMBER. We had considerable talk the other day about the imposition of this tariff duty upon the poor women who have to buy shears and scissors, and I confess that it was very touching; but here is something that will touch the pocketbook, and should, I think, carry as much weight as the arguments that were made at that time.

Here is a pair of shears that cost 15 cents abroad. I think it is good steel, but the price is 15 cents. That same pair of shears is retailed for $2.65. The spread is $2.50. The percentage of profit is 1,667 per cent. Let me ask those who are watching over the new-made grave and say that we lay the heavy hand of taxation upon the weeping widow and the sobbing child, does not this living profiteer, this man who makes 1,667 per cent, this daily profiteer who turns these shears over many times in the course of a year, present to you any field for a portion of a little revenue for the Government of the United States? The duty upon these shears is 20 cents a pair and 45 per cent ad valorem, and after deducting that duty we would still leave the importer 1,489 per cent profit.

Now, I have here a razor. This is not a cheap razor. I think this is a very good razor, one that sells for a good price, made of manganese steel. This razor was imported at a cost of 21 cents and it is a good razor. No one claims anything to the contrary. This razor which costs 21 cents was sold for $5 over the counter. There was a spread of $4.79. The duty upon it is 35 cents each and 15 per cent ad valorem. The spread is 2,281 per cent, and after taking off the duty the importer still has a profit of 2,064 per cent.

Mr. President, the Representative of the people who votes for every appropriation to spend money and against every tax to raise money, I know, may become very popular. I think he often is. But after all he is not a very useful Representative. We are appropriating about $4,000,000,000 per year. We must raise the money to meet these appropriations. We must do it in the way that will least disturb the great business of the country and will be the least burdensome upon the people. Now, remembering that the money must be raised somewhere, can anyone imagine a shoulder better fitted to bear a little portion of this mighty burden than that of the importer who, after paying the duty, has 2,064 per cent to spare?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not yield. I have a number of other articles here to present.

Mr. President, here is a very interesting article. Married men know what it is. It is a curling iron. That was imported and I presume it was sold by the importer, who is the retailer, at what he considered to be a very low price. It was imported for 9.6 cents and it was sold for $1.39. That left a spread of $1.294. That in percentage was 1,348 per cent. The Senate committee duty upon that article is 40 per cent ad valorem, and that after deducting the duty leaves a balance of 1,308 per cent to cover overhead charges and profit.

We have here a thermos bottle, imported. I do not know whether it is good or bad. I know we used to have to pay during war times $5 or $6 for these bottles, but I understand the price has come down somewhat. At any rate, this thermos bottle passed the customhouse at New York for 10 cents. It retailed for 75 cents, and that is the most reasonable spread that I have seen. The spread is 65 cents. The spread in percentage is 650 per cent. The Senate committee duty is 20 cents each and 50 per cent ad valorem. That would leave a balance of 450 per cent after paying all the duties to cover the overhead expense of the importer and his profit.

Of course it will be understood that these articles were imported under the general law, but I have not given the rates under the present law. I am simply taking what it costs in the foreign country and then considering what profit there would still be left after the duty had been paid which we propose in the pending bill. This would give them, as I said, 406 per cent on which to do business. That is not turned over once in the year for 406 per cent. It means that much on every turnover, and probably the capital is turned over a great many times in the course of a year.

Here is an English-made straw hat. They always make good articles there. This is a nobby little hat. It came in at the invoice price of 69 cents. It was purchased here for $4. The spread, therefore, was $3.31, but bear in mind it cost 69 cents and was sold for $4. The spread in percentage is 479 per cent. The party importing that hat would have to pay 50 per cent ad valorem. Of course that would be 50 per cent of 69 cents, and that would still leave a balance of 429 per cent on which to do business.

Here is another very ordinary article. It is what I would call a lady's workbasket. It has the usual assortment of little articles inside. The foreign cost was $1.29. It was purchased from the importer at $7.54. That left a spread of $6.28, and in percentage the spread was 498 per cent. The Senate committee duty is 50 per cent ad valorem, and that would leave the importer 448 per cent out of which to pay his overhead expenses and profit.

Here is a cane, a good cane, I think. It cost 16.8 cents. It is a good cane, although it cost only 16.8 cents. The New York gentleman who bought it paid $1.50 for that cane which cost 16 cents. That left $1.33 profit, or 792 per cent profit. The Senate committee would compel the importer to disgorge the awful sum of 40 per cent ad valorem, leaving him only 752 per cent, and he thinks he is imposed upon, and so he organizes this propaganda and calls upon the great press through which he advertises to destroy every American industry that he may have special benefits.

Here is one of the carving sets we were discussing the other day. I think it is a first-class set, with staghorn handles. I know it is first class because it cost $1.86 abroad. It was imported as such. The retail price was $15, which was paid for this set. That left $13.14 profit. That meant a spread of 706 per cent. The Senate committee rate of duty is equivalent to 77 per cent ad valorem, which would give the importer a profit of 629 per cent after having paid the duty. I really believe he could still do business with that kind of a profit, and I further believe that he is not justified in organizing this mighty propaganda to protect him in his enormous profits from paying a little, a very small percentage of it, to take care of the amounts which we must appropriate so frequently in the Senate of the United States.

Here [exhibiting] is a very fine jackknife, an imported knife. While I think it contains but two or three blades and appliances, it is supposed to be the very best which is made. That jackknife came through our customs at a cost of 57 cents and 7 mills. It has a little gold stamp upon it. Bear in mind the price—57 cents 7 mills. It was purchased from the gentleman who imported it for $8.40. That gave a spread of $7.823, or a difference of 1,356 per cent.

Senators will remember that when we had the knife item before us we imposed upon knives what appeared to be an enormous rate of duty, and which undoubtedly is larger than any of the other duties in the schedule; we imposed upon such a knife as this a duty of 40 cents and 60 per cent ad valorem; but after paying that duty the seller would still have a balance of 1,127 per cent profit.

Mr. President, I have here [exhibiting] a very beautiful plate. This comes in by the piece. It is finely decorated and would be pleasing to the eye of any lady. It is a good plate. It came in at a price of 19 cents; but it was sold by the retailer at 98 cents. That left 79 cents profit and gave the retailer a profit of 411 per cent. The rate of duty in the Senate committee bill is 70 per cent ad valorem, which would still leave the retailer 341 per cent profit on which to do business. I again submit that I believe the retailer can do business upon that profit, and still pay this little sum to help pay the expenses of the American Government.

I do not know what this (exhibiting) is now called, but when I was a boy we would have called it a flapjack turner. I presume it goes under some more euphonious name at the present time, but anyway, it is used in the kitchen. I think it is made of aluminum, a subject which we discussed here some days ago. That article came in for 4 cents and 1 mill, but it retails for 16 cents. That gives a profit of 11.9 cents, or 285 per cent. The duty proposed by the Senate committee is 15 cents a pound and 60 per cent ad valorem, which, figured out, gives an equivalent of 71 per cent. That leaves a balance on which to do business of 214 per cent. That, I believe, Mr. President, is the least percentage we have found in this list.

Here [exhibiting] is another article on which there is not so much profit made, but it is a beautiful article. It is made by the cheap labor of Czechoslovakia. It is a very beautiful wool blanket, probably one of the most expensive makes. That came in at considerable valuation, its cost being $19.40 at the customhouse, but it was retailed here for $65. That gave a profit of $45.60, or a spread of 275 per cent. In the bill as reported by the Senate committee the duty is 40 cents a pound and 40 per cent ad valorem, and reduced to an equivalent ad valorem it would be 46 per cent. After deducting the 46 per cent the importer would still have 189 per cent profit on which to do business.

Here [exhibiting] is another article, the delight of many a man. It is a briar pipe, undoubtedly one of the best made. It comes in at a big price. It is a fancy article.

Mr. STERLING. Where is it made?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is made in England. It comes in at a cost of $4.32.

Mr. WILLIS. It is too much.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know it is too much, but the dude who bought it paid $25 for the same article. That also is too much. That made a spread of $20.68 or 479 per cent profit. In the bill as reported by the committee the duty upon that briar pipe is 60 per cent ad valorem; and after paying that 60 per cent ad valorem there would still be left a profit of 419 per cent. How many times it is turned over, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. President, I shall finish up with this little article [exhibiting] which is now used, I think, in practically every American home where there is electric lighting. It is an ordinary electric smoothing iron or flatiron. Ladies know what price they pay here for it; but it came into this country—and it is a good iron; it is not a cheap article—for 59 cents, as the invoice shows, and the duty was paid upon 59 cents. It retailed for $5.50. So the spread between the invoice price and the retail price was $4.91, which left the poor importer only 832 per cent to cover his profit and overhead expenses. The duty as reported by the Senate committee upon that article is 50 per cent ad valorem and 10 cents per pound, I think; at any rate, it amounts in all to 60 per cent ad valorem, and it will still leave the seller 772 per cent profit.

Mr. President, the argument I have been making has not been made to justify any particular line of prices; it has been made solely to answer the propaganda of the press against the pending tariff bill, which propaganda is conducted by the press simply at the behest and because of the influence of the great importing houses of the country. There is not a single duty imposed by the pending bill but could be paid many times over by the importer without adding one penny to the sale price of the article to the American public and still allow a fairly good profit.

I repeat, we have got to raise money to run this Government; we can not run it on wind. So long as we vote appropriations we have got to impose some kind of a tax on some one to provide every dollar of our appropriations. After Senators consider this list let me ask, in all fairness and justice, do they know of any place on earth where we could levy a tax with less injustice than upon the enormous profits made by the importers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the new argument that comes from the protection camp. In all my experience in Congress this is the first time that I ever heard an argument to sustain the principle of protection made on such a basis as that advanced by the Senator from North Dakota.

I wish to review for a moment the position which the chairman of the Finance Committee has taken. He comes before the Senate not to attack his opponents upon this side of the Chamber; not to attack those who believe in a theory of levying taxes at the customhouse, which differs from his theory, but to bring an indictment against the press of the country; not the Democratic press, but the Republican press of the United States, charging them with a venal offense; that notwithstanding their papers have maintained the principles of the Republican Party, notwithstanding they have stood in the past for the principle of protection as advocated and maintained by the Republican Party, they have sold their columns—yes, more, that they have sold their editorial columns—for the price of advertisements from the great department stores of the metropolitan cities; that they have become venal and corrupt, abandoned the principles they have advocated in the past, and abandoned the principles of the party to which they have held allegiance in the past, because through their advertising columns their editorial columns have been purchased by the profits of the great department stores of America.

Mr. President, that is a most remarkable argument, a most remarkable position for the leader of the Republican Party on the floor of the Senate to take against the press of his own party, and yet that is all there is in the argument. That is the basis of the argument. That is the purpose of the speech to which we have just listened—an indictment of the Republican press of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if this wonderful address of the Senator from North Dakota—and I think it is wonderful—had been made at the time the Senate had before it the bill repealing the excess-profits tax, whether in his judgment it would have been deemed then a sufficient reason for the defeat of the bill repealing the excess-profits tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that represented the profits of the country, undoubtedly; but I hardly think the Senate would have tried all the people of the United States on the indictment that the Senator from North Dakota brings against the department stores. I rather think, as has been suggested in debate, that if this remarkable statement to which we have just listened is true, it is a question for the Department of Justice rather than for excise tax or customs tax. I am sorry that the Senator has not put into the RECORD the names of those who would profiteer on the American people, as he gives us his word as a Senator that some firms have done. The best indictment that could be brought against them would be to have their names published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and let the scorn of public opinion produce the result, not in the interest of increased cost but in the interest of the American people, by letting them know the fact of profiteering, if it is a fact, as asserted by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I simply want to call attention to the fact that on October 6 of last year the Senator from North Dakota contended in a speech, as appears on page 6078 of the RECORD, that the big concerns paid no excess-profits tax; that they were not making over 8 per cent; and now he stands here and indicts them for making 2,000 and 2,500 per cent. In other words, when he wanted to relieve them of taxes he said they did not make over 8 per cent, and now, when he wants to indict the Republican papers for telling the truth about his tariff bill, the same Senator, on the same floor, standing at the same desk, says that these concerns that he then said were making only 8 per cent were making 2,500 per cent. I should like to have him tell the North Dakota farmers who have gone into bankruptcy just how it was that when you wanted to relieve a concern of an excess-profits tax it was not making more than 8 per cent, but when you want to load an additional tax upon the consumers the importers are making 2,500 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the Senator from Arkansas says, the position the Senator from North Dakota has taken this afternoon is truly a reversal of form.

Mr. President, I was very much impressed by the opening remarks of the Senator from North Dakota. In his appeal to the country, in his appeal to the protectionists of the United States, he said that he wanted the great manufacturing industries of America to understand that this was their fight, not his fight; that this was their fight, not the fight of the Republican Party. He wanted the labor of the United States to understand that this was their fight, not his fight; that this was labor's fight, not the fight of the Republican Party. And yet what is the inevitable conclusion, if his statement is true and truly represents conditions in his bill? And I do not say that it is true, Mr. President. I know—and I do not charge it against the Senator from North Dakota—that there is a fake proposition in this statement. We are not given the name of the man who investigated the cost at the customhouse, nor are we given the name of the firm that sold to the purchaser these articles; but I want to try this case on the Senator's own theory.

The Senator appeals to the manufacturing interests of the United States and to labor in the United States on the ground that this is their fight. And then what does he prove, if his statements are correct in this matter? He first shows us a cuckoo clock, of which he says the cost abroad, the importing price, was 94 cents, and that it was sold in New York for $22, making a profit, so the Senator asserts, of 2,240 per cent—2,240 per cent on this cuckoo clock—and he says that he is going to protect the American manufacturer and American labor against a profit of 2,240 per cent by levying a duty of 50 per cent, which would leave a profit in excess of what he proposes to levy, if his story is correct, of 2,190 per cent.

If this Republican bill is not a fake, not a fraud, not a pretense against the American people, and the story of the leader of the Republican Party to which we have just listened is true, what appeal have you got left for the American manufacturer of clocks in the United States when you prove, according to the exhibits you bring before the Senate, that there is a profit to the importer of 2,240 per cent, and you attempt to protect the domestic industry with a 50 per cent duty—a 50 per cent duty—and appeal to labor on the ground that this is their fight? If that is true, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota and his committee are perpetrating a fraud on labor.

Let me say incidentally, however, that the annual production of clocks in the United States amounts to something like $230,000,000, and that the greatest importation of clocks during the last two or three years amounts to about $500,000, and that we are exporting in the neighborhood of $4,800,000 worth of clocks to foreign markets in competition with the world. With a manufacture of clocks in the United States of $233,000,000 and imports of about half a million dollars, the total imports are only a little over two-tenths of 1 per cent, and yet, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has come before the Senate and the country giving an exhibit of what is typical in the competition of the clock industry in foreign countries with that of the home manufacturers, and contends that there is an opportunity to make a profit of over 2,200 per cent.

Why, Mr. President, if that opportunity lay here in the business, if there is no catch in this matter, if this is an honest presentation of the real difference in the cost of production abroad and production at home, are not the American people sufficiently informed to know that if there were a profit of 2,200 per cent in favor of the importation of clocks from abroad the American market would be flooded with foreign clocks instead of the amount of imports coming in being only about two-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not forget that the argument advanced from the beginning in support of the rates in this bill was that the American producer was being threatened with destruction on account of the low prices of foreign products and not on account of the high prices of foreign products.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As sold in America, undoubtedly. But, Mr. President, the Senator said when he started out that he had taken the officers of the Treasury Department into his confidence and ordered them to find these facts; that he wanted to show how much profit these horrible department stores were making; and now I suppose these gentlemen, having been ordered by the highest authority in the Republican Party to go out and make a case, picked the cheapest clock they could find for importation and bought it at the store where they found that it was sold for the highest price.

Of course, I do not really expect the American public to believe that the illustrations made by the Senator are typical of American purchases abroad and American sales at home.

The Senator has exhibited a number of very attractive articles. I shall not refer to them at all. He shows us a pair of gloves, the import price of which he says is 27 cents, and he states that they retail for $2. He says himself that that gives a retail profit of 627 per cent, and he is levying a duty of only 70 per cent on them.

I have in the past gone to Gloversville, N. Y., to speak. The Senator has appealed to the labor of the country, and I suppose that was intended as an appeal to the labor of Gloversville, where a large portion of the profits growing out of these increased taxes will ultimately land; but I want to know how much of an appeal can come from the Republican Party as to protection of American labor, when the chairman of the Finance Committee stands on this floor and, speaking of an article of common use, such as gloves, says that there is a profit to the importer in this country of 627 per cent, and he is giving a protection of only 70 per cent. How does such an argument appeal to labor? You say you are going to protect American labor against foreign importations, and then you show that on a simple pair of kid gloves the profit to the importer is 627 per cent.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. If I calculate the duty correctly, the duty under the Underwood Act on this pair of gloves is something like 21 cents, while the 70 per cent provided in this bill would be only 18 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not talking about how much it is; I am talking about the figures the Senator from North Dakota gave. The Senator from New York need not try to convince me that the chairman of the Finance Committee has been wrong in his side show this afternoon. I am sure of that myself. I agree with the Senator about that. I am simply carrying the argument of the Senator from North Dakota to its final conclusions on his own basis. I know perfectly well that his figures are not correct. I know it just as well as does the Senator from New York.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator what figures are not correct? I am not in the habit of presenting fictitious figures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that these figures are not representative of the imports which come into America; that these are selected articles, which do not reflect the general conditions of the trade. That is what I mean.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that that is an entirely different matter from stating that I presented figures which were not correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed; I did not interrupt him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have known the Senator too long to believe that he wanted to make a statement that was incorrect, and I thought he would yield to have it corrected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but let me correct it first. I said some 15 minutes ago that I knew these things were not correct, but I discharged the Senator from North Dakota of any misrepresentation in reference to the matter. The Senator knows perfectly well that I am not making any personal charge against him. I know that these men whom he sent out to get these figures reported to him just as he has read them to the Senate. I do not question that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator does not understand how they were obtained.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes; I listened to the Senator, and I know how they were obtained.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator assumes something that is entirely wrong, but if he does not desire to have it corrected of course I will not do it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know perfectly well that the Senator has truthfully stated the facts as they were brought to him, but I know just as well that if his committee believed that there was a profit of 627 per cent to the retail importer of gloves they would not bring in a protective tariff of 70 per cent and say that that protected American industry. The Senator knows, as well as I do, that that particular pair of gloves is not representative of the general line of imports which come into the United States. He knows I mean that, and he knows that is true. If I was discourteous to the Senator a moment ago, I ask him to forgive me; I did not intend to be so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wanted the Senator to understand the basis on which these figures were obtained. I believe the Senator thinks we first went to the customs officers. That is not the way it was done. The goods were first purchased. I do not think somebody was looking for a special bargain; I never heard of that. The goods were purchased, and then identified by the customs appraisers. So there could be no question about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that. These men were sent out to find an indictment against the department stores, they brought the indictment to the table of the Senator from North Dakota, and he has presented it here; but I know that this is not a representative article, and I will tell the Senator why I know it. I will not call the name of the principal witness who appeared before his committee in reference to gloves, a very able gentleman, a very distinguished gentleman. I had the pleasure of serving with him in the House of Representatives for many years.

I have heard him testify before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and he is the leader in the manufacture of gloves in the United States. He did not represent in his testimony before the committee that there was any such difference in profits between the imported glove and the domestic article as 627 per cent, and he is content with the tax the Senator from North Dakota has given him in this bill of 70 per cent, because the Senator from North Dakota gave him the tax he asked for. I know, when that is the case, the performance this evening does not represent truly American import conditions, and I am sure the Senator from North Dakota will not contend that it does.

Let us go on a little further. The Senator showed us a pair of shears, on which he said the retail profit was 1,667 per cent, with a duty of 20 cents a pair and 45 per cent ad valorem added, making a total duty as levied in the bill the Senator has before the Senate of 178 per cent. In other words, if his statement is correct and the import price of this pair of shears, reflected into the profits of the seller in New York, amounts to 1,667 per cent, and the Senator gives a duty of 178 per cent to offset that, where is the American manufacturer of shears, how is American labor taken care of, if the statement of the Senator from North Dakota represents the true conditions in that line, when he proposes to leave to the importer a profit of 1,189 per cent, as he said he would?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator will certainly admit, however, that the increased duty proposed in the pending bill does come that much nearer protection than the duty under the Underwood law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, if the story were true——

Mr. EDGE. And the pending bill likewise provides for certain discretionary powers on the part of the Chief Executive when these great differences occur.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator met my argument before I got to it. He reached the conclusion before I could; but I am glad the distinguished Senator from New Jersey admits what we are coming to, and I shall speak to that in a minute. I am glad he confesses on the record what this bill will do to the American people, if the story told by the Senator from North Dakota this afternoon is correct.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I cheerfully admit, with great satisfaction and pleasure, if the Senator will yield for a moment, that the proposal in the pending bill, from my viewpoint, at least, provides the only possible method through which we can scientifically reach the tremendous differences which now exist between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here, and if under the law which bears the name of the distinguished Senator from Alabama importers can make such tremendous profits, certainly under the pending bill, if it becomes a law, those profits will be substantially reduced.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for this testimony. Now, just allow me to mention a few more items, and we will go to that point.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest to the Senator that if these extraordinary profits could be made in the way which has been related to us to-day, the imports into this country would have been very largely in excess of what they in fact have been.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, that is true; but I am not testifying for the Senator from North Dakota. I am not accepting his conclusions. In fact, I am sure he is entirely wrong. But we are trying the case now on the testimony that has been laid before the court this afternoon, and that is all I am trying to work out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to test the importance of these figures by referring to the matter of production and imports of a few of the items. I will refer to just one, because I do not want to take the time of the Senator.

Electric-light bulbs are included in the articles with reference to which the importers are making such enormous profits. I find that of electric-light bulbs in 1919 we produced $59,372,000 worth. We imported in 1920 less than $500,000 worth, and in 1921 we imported less than one-half of that amount—not to exceed $250,000 worth—while we exported $4,000,000 worth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the statement of the Senator from Montana demonstrates beyond question that if these enormous profits were a fact and not a theory, the American market would have been overflowed with electric-light bulbs, whereas the imports were negligible.

Let us take the question of the razor, which the Senator said was a really good razor. I do not know whether the shears were good or not, but he said the razor is a good one. He said the import price was 21 cents, and that it sold for $5. He stated that the duty levied in this bill was 30 cents and 35 per cent ad valorem, which left a profit to the importer of 1,500 per cent above the protection levied in the bill.

The Senator exhibited a thermos bottle, about a 30-cent bottle. I will not go into that, because anybody who looked at the bottle saw conclusively that it was made out of paper and would not last long.

Let us take up the question of the hat the Senator showed—a very good-looking hat. I do not know how it would wear, but it looked all right across the Chamber. He said that it was imported at 69 cents and that the retail price was $4, leaving a profit to the importer of $3.31, or 479 per cent, against which the Senator proposed to protect American manufacturers and American labor by levying a tax of 50 per cent.

Now, just think of it! The Senator from North Dakota carries the flag of protection. He stands here the embodiment of all that the protection system means, and yet he comes on the floor of the Senate and confesses that he has evidence to show that to the importers of straw hats there is a profit of 479 per cent, and he is going to protect these people against the pauper labor of Europe by levying a 50 per cent tax. Is it not just awful, Mr. President, to think how the Senator from North Dakota has surrendered the great trust which has been imposed upon him to protect the American laborer against the pauper labor of Europe, and given to the importer of goods made by pauper labor an advantage of 479 per cent over the American-made article. Why, Mr. President, it is outrageous to think of it from a protection standpoint.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. Of course, the Sentaor understands that there are provisions in the bill by which the President can put on the American valuation an increase of duties to the extent of 50 per cent. In such cases as these, may I ask the Senator, should not the President put on the American valuation and protect American industry? And is not that the purpose of that provision of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator, instead of answering his question, whether he thinks the President in a case like this ought to do that?

Mr. GOODING. Most assuredly I think he should. If I had my way I would have the American valuation in the bill to start with, and I would protect without bothering the President at all. Again, I will say to the Senator that if we had the American-valuation plan the imports, which show up now as negligible or nothing at all, would be very high of these particular articles from the foreign countries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is a real protectionist.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I am.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He believes in that principle——

Mr. GOODING. All the way through.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And he is not afraid to say so. That is the man I like to see, the man who when he has a principle stands for it. I thank the Senator for his testimony in this matter, because that is what I am coming to. I wanted some sustaining testimony. I have already had the testimony of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and now I have testimony from a real protectionist, whose protectionism nobody can doubt.

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that if it were not for the provision in the bill which gives the President the right to put on the American valuation all he says would be true, but the fact that it is there causes his argument to fall to the ground. That is why the provision is in the bill. Again let me say to the Senator that there will be no trouble about the names of these importing department stores before we get through with this debate. This is only a part of the show.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for his testimony. My recollection is that the Senator said the other day that agriculture in this bill was protected at an average rate of 21 per cent. Am I correct about that?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; 21½ per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Twenty-one and one-half per cent.

Mr. GOODING. And I also stated that the Underwood-Simmons law gave the manufacturers of the country a protection of 24½ per cent, and on some of the articles shown this afternoon the Underwood-Simmons law gave a duty of 60 per cent and 55 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for testifying to the reasonableness of the rates in the existing law.

Mr. GOODING. I ask the Senator when he is going to take up the schedule of rates that he has put on the manufacturers, and let them down?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to the very moderate rates in the present law compared to where he wants to put them. But let me finish my canvass of the illustrations we had this afternoon, and then I shall not detain the Senate very much longer, because I want to point out a conclusion.

We were shown a very beautiful carving set, of which the Senator from North Dakota said the import price was $1.80, and that it was sold by the importer at $15, leaving him a profit of $13.14, or a spread of 706 per cent. The Senator from North Dakota says that he intends to protect the American manufacturer and American laborer against that 706 per cent of profit of the importer by a duty of 77 per cent. Just think of it. With a profit on carving sets to the importer of 706 per cent, the Senator is going to do his duty by a protective tariff to the American laborer by levying a tax of 77 per cent.

On a jackknife which cost 5.73 cents and which sold for $8.40 by the importer, the importer got a spread or a percentage profit of 1,357 per cent. The Senator from North Dakota protests against that enormous profit by levying a duty of 40 cents and 60 per cent ad valorem, or 229 per cent. Then he carried us into the household as to plates and showed us a plate that cost 19 cents and sold for 98 cents, and he said that was one of the lowest percentages that the importer got out of these articles. In that case the importer got 411 per cent, and the Senator is levying a duty of only 70 per cent against those articles to protect against the importer's profit of 411 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota is either wrong or right about the proposition that these enormous profits are being made. These specfic figures are not the only protection that he gives in the bill. The Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Idaho anticipated what I was leading to. The Senator from North Dakota and his committee have placed a provision in the administrative features of the bill authorizing the President of the United States to ascertain the difference in competitive value—I am not useing the exact language, but that is the meaning of it—which I will interpret to be the difference in cost value, and then to increase the tax as much as 50 per cent. So if the articles which the Senator from North Dakota has brought before the Senate are truly illustrative of import conditions in the United States the American public can take it from the argument of the Senator from North Dakota that the taxes which are going to be levied against them on imported articles are not going to be what are stated in the bill, but that under the administrative provisions of the bill the President of the United States will be compelled to increase by 50 per cent each tax that is levied. In other words, to the tax on jackknives, which now is 229 per cent, the President will be compelled to add 114½ per cent more to the tax carried in the bill.

So the American people, in estimating the kind of a bill under which they are going to be taxed, must at least increase this class of taxes 50 per cent above what they are to-day proposed to be made. The Senator from Idaho and the Senator from New Jersey agree with me that that is the condition which we must face. If that is so, and these enormous profits have been made, I think the Senator from North Dakota was very modest in his inroads on the pocketbooks of the American people when he limited the power of the President to increase the tax by Executive order to not more than 50 per cent.

Now, to come right down to the question, this exhibit is nothing new to me. I have seen the same kind of an exhibit made before the taxing committee of the House. It has been brought before the taxing committee of the House on almost every tariff bill that has been written in recent years. It is the old form in which the protected monopoly proceeds to make its argument. Of course, there are department stores which are making enormous profits on certain articles and which also sell other articles at very reasonable prices. It would not be difficult for anyone who would take the time and the energy to follow through some particular article of import that can be palmed off on the American people who do not know and show an enormous difference in cost.

This form of exhibit is nothing of to-day or of this hour or of this year. It was done repeatedly before the Ways and Means Committee of the House when I was a member of that committee. I have had men come to my office and make this same kind of an exhibit with the same class of articles as displayed in the show we have had before the Senate this afternoon. I have no doubt, as to the particular articles which were brought before me or which the chairman of the Finance Committee brings before us this afternoon, that they can prove the fact. But they do not represent American industry; they do not represent general conditions abroad nor general conditions at home. It is just one of these side-show plays that do not represent the actual conditions.

There are two things which prove that my statement is absolutely true. First, in all these lines the American market has not been flooded by this class of imports, which flood undoubtedly would take place if it were so profitable to bring them in. Second, because the representatives of the great manufacturers of America come before the committees time after time asking protection, and they always ask for more than they expect to get. They ask the limit and never ask any rates approximating what the exhibit of the Senator from North Dakota this afternoon would indicate were the profits of the importer. In truth and in conclusion let me say——

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If that exhibition and exhibit—I refer to both—represents the real difference in cost of manufacture abroad and in the United States, then in order to protect the American industry against extinction by the importation of foreign-made goods we would have to raise the cost of living on an average about 2,000 per cent, would we not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARAWAY. On a pair of shoes, for instance, that cost $10 now, the price would have to go to $200, if that is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is true that the importers are exacting these enormous profits, how would the imposition of such a duty raise the cost of living?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. May I answer that question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely wish to suggest that if the tariff does not raise the price of the article, it does not protect anybody. If a thousand per cent duty be placed on an article of American make and the seller should be forced to sell it at the same price for which he was previously selling it, he would get no benefit of protection, would he?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course he would not, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] knows that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Wisconsin read the statement of the Senator from Arkansas backward. The Senator from Arkansas said that if such a condition existed—of course it does not exist; the Senator from Wisconsin knows it does not exist, and I know it does not exist——

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody knows it does not exist.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But that if it did exist, and the American manufacturer was threatened with that kind of competition, and we had to raise the rates of duty to equalize the difference, it would make a pair of shoes cost $200; that that would be the case under such circumstances; but, of course, the circumstances do not exist.

Mr. President, I did not intend this afternoon to be harshly critical. I challenged the statement of the Senator from North Dakota not as to his veracity or his earnestness or his honesty, but I challenged it as to the facts, because I know that the facts are not representative of the import conditions or conditions of the American market. However, I do not blame the Senator for coming to the defense of the bill. It is time for him to come to its defense. He has been indicted by the press of his party from coast to coast because of the indefensible rates contained in the bill and the burden of taxation that was about to be placed on the American public. He has sat in silence and accepted the condemnation for weeks and weeks and weeks, and I had expected long before this that the Senator from North Dakota would accept the challenge of the newspapers of his own party and reply to them. If he does not reply to them satisfactorily, of necessity he will be condemned, so far as this bill is concerned, in the eyes of the American public. It is but natural, therefore, for the Senator from North Dakota to reply.

However, I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that he must bring before the Senate a real defense, a defense that goes to the real conditions, and he must not expect the American public or the American newspapers to relinquish their present line of argument and present understanding of this bill because of a showing as to a few articles concerning which abnormal conditions prevail, an exhibition that might do credit to a side show in Barnum's Circus. The illustrations brought forward by the Senator are too unusual and too unnatural to stand as his defense before the American public.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has always been so fair in his presentation of questions before the Senate that I confess I am surprised, I am amazed, I may say, to find the Senator now departing so far from his usual custom in the presentation of his side of the case. It is a surprise to me to listen to the Senator from Alabama, who is an expert upon tariff legislation, arguing before the Senate that, because we have demonstrated the existences of a retail price of several thousand per cent profit, we should impose a duty to protect against such a retail price. Again and again in this debate has the Senator from Alabama asserted that instead of imposing a rate of 50 per cent upon a hat or 70 per cent upon scissors or whatever the article might be, if my argument were correct, I should have proposed to levy a duty of as many per cent as would equalize the difference between the importing price and the retail selling price of the article.

The Senator knows that is an unfair statement. The Senator knows that a protective tariff duty is not to protect the retail price, but is to protect the American manufacturer. The American manufacturer sells his product at wholesale, sometimes to the jobber and sometimes to the merchant, who may be the retailer, but in all instances, if there is to be a protective duty, the duty should measure the difference between the landing cost of the foreign article in the American market and the selling price of the manufactured article by the manufacturer in the American market.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in a moment. If, therefore, a 50 per cent duty or a 70 per cent ad valorem duty is sufficient to measure the difference between the importing price and the selling price of the comparable American article by the American manufacturer, then 60 or 70 per cent ad valorem should be the rate of duty. No one has ever dreamed, however, of suggesting a duty, either directly or through the intervention of the President, under the special provisions of the bill, that would meet the difference between the importing price and what any retailer sought to charge the American public. The retail price may be 2,000 per cent higher, as has been shown, in some instances, and yet the American producing price of the comparable article may be only 70 per cent higher.

By the exhibits which I have produced, and the illustrations I have given, I have merely sought to show that the American importers who are also retailers are making such enormous profits—of course, I did not refer to the manufacturers' profits but the retailers' profits—that they could absorb the little tax upon the imported article many times over without in the slightest degree affecting their prosperity. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I confess my surprise at the argument used by my friend, the Senator from North Dakota. He has referred to the profits which have been derived by the retailers selling imported articles. It is true they have derived great profits, but the retailers can just as well make exorbitant profits out of articles manufactured in this country. The Senator's argument, therefore, must lead to the conclusion that it is the retailer and not the importer who has been offending against the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. No matter what he makes, I have given the facts, and the facts are that the articles to which I referred were imported at the prices quoted and they were sold by the importer at the enormous advances indicated. The only object I had in view was to show that the spread between the importing price and the selling price of the importer, who is also the retailer, is sufficient to take care of the tax without passing that tax on to the American consumer, and to demonstrate my belief that the consumer would not bear it, although the importers are evidently holding up the consumer for everything they can get out of him, irrespective of price. I have not attempted to analyze their overhead charges; I know they are more or less great; but, nevertheless, after paying them, they will have still a sufficient profit to meet the tariff duty. I do not want the duty to represent the profit which is finally derived from the sale of the article by the retailer; I want the duty to represent as nearly as possible the difference in the landing cost of the imported article and the manufacturing cost of the American manufacturer. The Senator from Alabama must admit, I think, that it is unfair to charge or to assume that I would impose a tariff sufficiently high to meet the two or three thousand per cent which is made by the retailer, who also is an importer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, of course, I did not charge the Senator with that. I merely took the Senator's argument and endeavored to show where it would lead. Of course, I assume, as every other man must assume, that if the condition as to prices portrayed by the Senator were true, and if it had anything to do with the tariff, it was because the American manufacturer could not meet those prices, and that if the importers could sell at such enormous profits indicated by the Senator, of course they could control the American market and that the rates proposed by the bill would not protect the American manufacturer. I was merely drawing a conclusion from the Senator's own statement.

Of course, I know perfectly well, without controverting a single statement made by the Senator as to the articles which the Senator put in evidence, that those articles are not representative of the competitive conditions prevailing as between this country and foreign countries, and I said that I was simply making my argument on the basis that the Senator said the importer had that much profit, and, of course, if he did and you were going to protect against that much profit to the importer you would have to put up the rate to meet it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, if we made our rates measure the retail selling price, we would have to do that; but we would not be protecting the American manufacturer. We would simply be placing an embargo upon imports, because if we put at any time on any article a tariff that represented the difference between the cost of the foreign article and the retail price in the United States not a single article could be imported into the United States, and no one would for a moment think of an argument of that kind.

But, Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in saying that these are not representative articles. That is a representative hat—an ordinary hat—bought down here in the spring of the year for from four to five dollars, perhaps reduced in September to a dollar. That hat cost 69 cents. It was sold for $4, and it is a representative hat. Probably the American manufacturer can make that hat for a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half. If he could make it for a dollar and a quarter, then his 50 per cent ad valorem would take care of it. That has nothing to do with the retailer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, that looks like a hat that people ordinarily wear, and in that respect it is representative. What I contended was that the conditions of its purchase and its sale were not representative. Of course, I know that that is a hat; but the Senator has finally admitted himself out of his own case, because he says that the immense spread of profit that he asked the Senate to believe in an hour or two ago does not exist. Of course, I know what he is coming to, and what is the fact—that these retailers and wholesalers have taken out their profits along the line, and that the cost of selling is very great; and when you come down to analyze this great spread which the Senator represented as going to the importer you will not find that it is there. It is absorbed by the wholesaler's profit if it is a wholesaler, and in the case of the retailer by the cost of running the business. As I said, what the Senator represented as a spread on these articles of profit when you come to the last analysis does not exist, because if it did exist, as I have argued from the Senator's own statement, if there were any such profit existing to the American importer, this country would be flooded with imports, and the Senator knows that as well as I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if there were a profit to the importer without making the sales at retail, the Senator is correct in saying that this country would be flooded with imports as soon as the articles could be manufactured in the foreign countries; but the Senator still avoids the real point and the real purpose of presenting everything that I have presented to-day.

I do not argue myself out of court when I say that the spread between the manufacture of a like article in the United States and this article does not amount to two or three or five or six hundred per cent, or two thousand per cent, whatever is the difference between that and the retail price. That is not the purpose of the presentation of this case at all. We are giving a protection that will approximately take care of the manufacturer of this hat. If we think that 70 per cent ad valorem upon the foreign value will take care of the manufacturer, that is all we should give him; but that has nothing to do with the question whether or not the department store, which is itself an importer and sells this hat at a spread of five or six hundred per cent, can afford to pay the 70 per cent ad valorem tax, if it be a tax at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, that comes right down to the point at which we want to arrive. Of course, I knew it came there. I do not think the spread between the importing cost and the cost of manufacture of that hat or the average hat at home or abroad amounts to 70 per cent, but the Senator does, because he says himself he has fixed 70 per cent to cover that difference.

Mr. McCUMBER. The spread is more than that, but I will not go into that now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is what the Senator thought would cover the difference. That is what he put before the country as a proper protection, and he is a protectionist, and he put that there to show that he was covering the difference in cost. He now says that the profit on that hat, according to my recollection, was 600 per cent, and yet that a tariff of 70 per cent will cover it.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am not talking about the retailer's profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will let me proceed a minute, then the difference in the competitive point between the American article and the foreign article is only 70 per cent. The Senator has said that these retail stores make 600 per cent, or, at least, had a 600 per cent profit without taking out the cost.

Then, Mr. President, it is merely a question that has nothing to do with imports. It clearly demonstrates that that increased price is absorbed somewhere, or that somebody is profiteering.

If it is absorbed in the ordinary cost of running these stores—their clerks, their rent, and so on, except reasonable profit—there is nobody to complain. If they are profiteering above the 70 per cent on foreign goods, you can rest assured that they are profiteering above that per cent on the American goods; and that is not a question of tariff at all, or of tariff tax, or of paying the tax, because the importer and the storekeeper do not pay it. They make the American public pay it; and then it is a question of the Department of Justice bringing an indictment against somebody, because the store is not going to pay the tax. The store takes it out of the man or the woman who buys the goods from its shelves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator still avoids the whole trend and purpose of this argument.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must say, then, that I have not seen it. If I have avoided it, I have not seen it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me make it so clear that a child can understand it, and then I hope the Senator will not go off on that tangent again.

Here is the great press of the country, representing the great department stores who purchase its advertising space. The department stores are both importers and retailers of the same article. They are the ones, through this press, that are condemning this tariff as being an imposition upon them and saying that it will require them to raise their prices to the consumer. That is a clear statement that anyone ought to understand. I seek to meet that by showing that, taking their present selling prices and the profits they make over and above their importing prices, they can absorb the 50 or 60 or 70 per cent and it will scarcely be a drop in the bucket compared with the spread between the importing prices and their retail prices.

I have not discussed in this matter for one moment what was necessary to protect the manufacturer. The duty which will protect him we will put upon the product as nearly as we can. We do not need always to make it just as large as the difference. He lives here at home. This is his country. He has his agents over the country. He can respond quickly to an order. That gives him some advantage, and a considerable advantage, as a rule, over his competitor. Therefore, I would not give him in any case an amount that would actually measure the difference between the foreign importing price and his selling price. I do not think it is necessary. I would make it less at all times.

Let us just leave the matter of protection to the manufacturer out of consideration in this connection, because I have not touched upon it. I have simply demonstrated by these exhibits that the duty which we have laid upon these goods can be absorbed several times over and still leave this importing retailer a sufficient profit without adding the duty to the cost to the public.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator really think that? I am sure he must if he says so, but he has not given us any figures to show the cost of sales by the retailer. He has not brought any figures here. He showed us some very large profits between the import price and the selling price, but he has not shown any figures as to how that is absorbed.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I have not, Mr. President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is merely assuming that that is the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I am.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And, because the Republican press has turned on the Senator's bill, he wants to turn the wrath of the American people upon the Republican press and the department stores. I think the Senator has not made out his case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the press of which the Senator speaks has always been against protection since the advent of the great department stores and their mighty influence through the medium of their advertising. They may be Republican on everything else, but when it comes to a tariff bill the papers of which the Senator speaks have always advocated the interest of the importer. I do not care what you call them, but those are the facts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If you can corrupt a paper, say, like the New York Tribune, by giving it advertising, you could buy it with money straight out, probably, could you not?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what the Senator says; I have not said that.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does the Senator from North Dakota say?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not said that.

Mr. CARAWAY. If a man will sell out for advertising, would he not sell out for cash?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not said that at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. What did the Senator mean to say when he said these people were controlled and influenced by the great department stores? Did he mean to say that they were selling their editorials?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has views entirely different from mine.

Mr. CARAWAY. Not about honesty, I hope.

Mr. McCUMBER. He represents the views of his constituents.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no doubt but that his views are colored more or less by the sentiments of the people who daily surround him in his home State. I would not say that, because his views were thus influenced and thus colored by his surroundings, he was not acting honestly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just a moment. The Senator is getting away from the question. Did I not understand the Senator to say that these papers were controlled by the advertisements which appeared in their pages?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator heard what I said.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. It may be that the Senator thinks he is before a justice of the peace, and that I am put on trial. I assure him that I shall not put myself in that position, though it may be decidedly pleasing to the Senator. Let him ask me a straight question, and he will get an answer.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it always——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. He did not object to my asking a question. Nobody is doing that but the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to talk in his own time, and no two Senators shall talk at the same time while the present occupant is in the chair. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from North Dakota yielded to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for any question the Senator asks, but I decline to be catechized in that manner.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator does not want to answer a question yes or no, he has a perfect right to refuse. I had thought, however, that some way or another he wanted to bring in an indictment, and both of us having practiced law, we usually say just what we mean as to what a man has done. I understood the Senator to say that these great papers had sold out merely to get advertising. I do not say he used that language, but it was that in effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yielded for a question. I wish the Senator would ask it, and if I think it is a proper question I will answer it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was that what the Senator meant to charge?

Mr. McCUMBER. I decline to answer it, because I do not think it is a proper question. I have stated that these papers were influenced, very naturally, by the great importing houses that use their columns. That is their work. They are in close connection with it. I do not mean that they could be bought for money any more than I would say that the Senator could be so bought because he is influenced by his Democratic surroundings and because he arrives at conclusions which are entirely different from mine. I do not think the Senate floor is the proper forum in which to charge criminality of that kind against anyone.

I have presented the facts. I think the facts which I have presented are well authenticated, and that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is mistaken when he says that these are a few articles and they are not representative. Every article was bought in the open market at these stores, and the prices I cited were the prices at which they were sold that day. Not a single one of them was purchased upon a red-letter day, but only in the ordinary course of purchases. I think they are representative, and I think I have established the one fact I sought to establish, namely, that these importing houses, which are also retailers, and which are the ones crying out the most loudly against this bill, can well afford, with these profits, to take care of the little tax we have levied against them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, and ask that it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 306) was read, as follows:

Whereas it has been charged upon the floor of the Senate, supported by figures descending into particulars and evidenced by documents, that importers are making unconscionable profits on many articles made abroad and sold in American markets, amounting in some cases to upwards of 2,000 per cent; and

Whereas most—or, at least, many—of such articles are imported and sold by various individuals and corporations supposed to be competing against each other for the trade in such articles; and

Whereas it is evident that the exorbitant prices at which such commodities are sold, as shown by evidence submitted to the Senate, if they generally prevail could be exacted or maintained only if a combination exists among such importers in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act: Be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to advise the Senate whether such conspiracy does in fact exist and what steps have been taken or are to be taken to bring the participants therein to justice.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not satisfied with the whereases of the resolution. If the Senator wants an investigation as to whether these goods are sold abroad for the prices I have mentioned, I most heartily welcome the investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to have that investigation made.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I shall not be a party to assuming that there is any conspiracy upon the part of the sellers of these articles, or the importers, and therefore I ask that the resolution may go over. If it be made to conform to an examination into the real facts, facts which have been stated here, I shall most earnestly support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution, and it will go over.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the articles exhibited here this afternoon tell the story, in my judgment, of a World War, of a world out of adjustment, of depreciated currency, of labor in some countries receiving practically nothing at all, and time and again evidence has been submitted in the Senate to prove that fact.

Only to-day I met a pioneer from my State in my office, who but a short time ago returned from Germany, and he told me the story of men working there in factories for 20 cents a day, and in pretty nearly every line of industry. I have submitted here on two different occasions facts as to the employment of men in the trades in Germany for 70 cents a day, on the average, men engaged in the principal trades followed in America.

I think we can understand that the goods which have been shown here this afternoon can not be produced when the world is at normal for the prices which have been stated here this afternoon. There is no question of the need of the American valuation, which this bill provides as the basis for figuring the duties, so that this country and the industries represented in these particular goods can be protected.

I have an editorial here from a Democratic paper, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. It tells the story of a debate upon the floor of the Senate between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and it so well tells the story of depreciated currency and what it means in the purchase of goods on the gold basis, that I want it in the RECORD. I ask to have the editorial read.

There being no objection, the editorial was read, as follows:

A SAMPLE OF DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP.

Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, the other day supplied the country with a striking illustration of the kind of leadership the Democrats have to depend upon in the United States Senate.

The tariff bill was being discussed, and Senator SIMMONS was endeavoring to show that the German manufacturer to-day has no advantage over the American manufacturer in the matter of cheap labor. And here is the way he went about it:

"Everybody who knows anything about the matter," he said, "knows that the exchange value of the mark—and that is the value upon which our purchases from Germany are based—is entirely different from the purchasing power of the mark in Germany; that is to say, a mark has one value in international trade and has an entirely different value in the German market. It has a purchasing power in the German market which it has not in the world at large by reason of the reduction of the paper currency in Germany to the gold standard that obtains in international trade.

"The wages paid the German laborer in marks to-day will buy for him as much, or nearly as much, of the necessaries of life as the wages paid in American factories will buy. I heard the testimony given before the Finance Committee in the general hearings. The mark has one purchasing power in Germany, but it has a different purchasing power in the markets of the world. The Germans have some confidence in their mark, while we have none and the world has none."

Now, let it be understood that Senator SIMMONS was citing this to show that the German manufacturer has no advantage over the American manufacturer. It proves the very opposite, of course, but by some mysterious process of reasoning Senator SIMMONS arrived at the conclusion that it proved that it cost quite as much to manufacture goods in Germany as it costs in the United States.

Senator SMOOT, of Utah, took full advantage of the curious lapse of the Senator from North Carolina. He called particular attention to Senator SIMMONS's utterance, and said:

"I hope the Senate will now remember the statement which has just been made by the Senator from North Carolina, because I am going to call his attention to it a good many times in the future if this question shall then come up. The position of the Senator now is in exact accord with what I have stated on the floor of the Senate several times. Because of the exchange situation to which the Senator has referred, the German laborer, with the purchasing power of the mark in Germany greater than it is outside, has that much advantage over the American laborer, while the American dollar does not have any greater purchasing power in purchasing labor or any other commodities in the United States than it has abroad. The Senator from North Carolina simply makes his case that much worse by the statement which he has just made."

This is a fact, of course. There is one commodity which a German mark can buy no more of in Germany than it can buy elsewhere, and that commodity is gold. And that's because gold is the world's standard of value. And any currency convertible into gold on any basis has the same advantages in Germany that the mark has. Senator SIMMONS says that the German mark will buy more in Germany than it will buy outside of Germany. In other words, it will buy more German goods than it will buy of American goods. That's only another way of saying that the German goods are cheaper. And what is true of the mark is certainly true of the dollar, is it not? The dollar will buy more German goods than it will buy of American goods. Does that not give the German manufacturer an advantage over the American manufacturer in the American market?

We thought that "everybody who knows anything about the matter" knew that until the ranking Democratic member of the Senate Finance Committee, the leader of the Democratic Party on the question of the tariff in the Senate, disclosed that he does not know it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had intended to indulge in some remarks this afternoon in reply to the argument of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I shall not do so because of the lateness of the hour, but shall content myself with probably doing so later on. All I desire to say this afternoon is that, in my humble judgment, the Senator from North Dakota, in the speech he made this afternoon, has argued both himself and his bill out of court.

The Senator complains bitterly of the way in which the newspapers of the country, especially independent and Republican newspapers, have assailed his bill. With the new light which the Senator from North Dakota has thrown upon the bill, I am satisfied that many more Republican papers in the future than in the past will deal with the Senator's bill like those papers of which he has complained. I am likewise satisfied that many Republicans other than those who have heretofore repudiated his bill will, as a result of his utterances upon the floor this afternoon, be added to the number of critics and opponents of the bill.

If the Senator is right in his contention this afternoon, then the bill affords no remedy whatsoever for the conditions which he says exist, and nothing, Mr. President—absolutely nothing—will afford the remedy which the Senator says he desires and is seeking except a universal embargo.

Mr. President, I regret very much that I have not, on account of the lateness of the hour, and without unnecessarily wearying the Senate, an opportunity to enter upon a discussion of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I thought the Senator had concluded. I merely wish to say, with reference to the exhibits offered this afternoon by the Senator from North Dakota, that every transaction and every step in the work will be given to the Senate. There will be nothing left unsaid or undone to give the country the whole truth—every particle of it—all the way through. I think the country is entitled to it. I think the people are entitled to know who the importers are, who the retailers are, and everything else in connection with the exhibits which were made here this afternoon and which will be made in the future.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Idaho has concluded, I will say that the information which the Senate is now getting from the other side of the Chamber and the information which the Senator from Idaho promises in the future was not forthcoming until we smoked them out by exposing their bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its session on this calendar day it shall recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 11827) granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have from the Committee on Commerce a favorable report on an identical bill, and I desire to report back the House bill just referred and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask if the bill is in the usual form?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is in the usual form.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the city of Glasgow, in the county of Howard, and State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I move that the Senate take a recess, the recess being under the order just made, until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 15, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

To our bountiful Father in heaven we offer our tribute of thanksgiving, for we are blest and kept in Thy love. We ascribe unto Thee, O Lord, dominion, honor, and glory. Throughout our country diminish the causes of crime, vice, and poverty. Everywhere dispel the mists of folly and presumption and teach men that righteousness, justice, and obedience to law exalteth a nation. Convert into noble effects all the forces of our beings. May the din of desire or the pressure of affairs never be able to drown our soul's appeal, which is to know God, whom to know is life eternal. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, IN HOWARD COUNTY, MO.

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11827) granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the city of Glasgow, in the county of Saline, and State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 8, page 1, strike out the word "Saline" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Howard."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the pressing necessity for considering this bill to-day rather than on the call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar on Monday next?

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri. Because they are waiting to start the construction of this bridge. The bonds have all been voted, and it is a part of our program in the State in the building of highways.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that a delay of four days will be disastrous to the county courts of Saline and Howard Counties, Mo., in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri. I do not know. However, I may be called away on account of sickness in my family at home, and I am very anxious to get the bill through on that account.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if it is a matter of personal convenience to the gentleman, that is a different matter; but I could not understand why there should be so much importance in a delay of four days.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the reason for the gentleman's calling it up, and probably the reason why the Speaker recognized the gentleman, it is that there is an emergency existing because of the fact that the gentleman's family is sick and he wants to leave the city.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he did not recognize the gentleman for that reason. The Chair was not aware of that fact. The Chair recognized the gentleman because he was told that there was an emergency, and that they were waiting in order to commence the construction of the bridge.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the Chair that, of course, if a delay for a period of four days is such an emergency it would justify taking the bill up and the gentleman ought to be recognized, but the gentleman has a good reason why he should call it up in view of the fact that there is sickness in his family.

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri. I do not mean to say that I am going to leave, but I may be called at any time; such are the circumstances.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, this bill needs the presence of the gentleman here because it is of great importance. However, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8785. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Mobridge Bridge Co., of Mobridge, S. Dak., to construct a pontoon bridge across the Missouri River;

H. R. 10330. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Croix at or near the city of Prescott in the State of Wisconsin; and

H. R. 11345. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Freeport, Pa.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6313. An act authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to grant a right of way for a public highway to the county of Skagit, Wash.;

H. R. 11407. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920;

H. R. 11646. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River near Steubenville, Ohio;

H. R. 7052. An act for the relief of G. C. Caldwell;

H. R. 9859. An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11265. An act to authorize the maintenance of a bridge constructed across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington; and

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 2664. An act for the relief of Jesse Goodin;

S. 2666. An act for the relief of Ed Thomas and Pauline Thomas;

S. J. Res. 204. Joint resolution to authorize the loan by the Secretary of War to the commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans of cots for the use of the members of the United Confederate Veterans during the sessions of the national encampment of the United Confederate Veterans at Richmond, Va., from June 19 to 22, 1922; and

S. J. Res. 7. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate depositaries of public moneys in foreign countries and in the Territories and insular possessions of the United States.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Banking and Currency.

STATE TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5219. That nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State within which the association is located, but the legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject to the following restrictions:

"1. (a) That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of such State coming into competition with the business of national banks.

"(b) That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed upon the net income derived from such other moneyed capital, such State may, in lieu of a tax on the shares, impose upon the bank an income tax, assessed upon the net income of the bank, but such tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed on the net income of such other moneyed capital.

"2. That the shares of any national banking association, owned by nonresidents of any State, shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

"3. That the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as heretofore in force shall not prevent the legalizing, ratifying, or confirming by the States of any tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed upon the shares of national banks, or the collecting thereof, to the extent that such tax has been or is in accord with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this section: Provided, That this shall not apply to taxes attempted to be levied before January 1, 1917."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, the act of June 3, 1864, as amended in 1868. That is the section of the statute which gives the States the right to tax in a limited manner the stockholders of national banks. For the purpose of getting this matter clearly before the House, I want to read the original law of 1864, and then the bill as amended in 1868. It is a rather complex proposition, and I hope the Members of the House will pay particular attention to the reading of the statute and the amended portions thereof. Section 41 of the national banking act of 1864 read as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent all the shares of any of the said associations held by any person or body corporate from being included in the valuation of personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of taxes imposed by and under State authority at the place where such bank is located, and not elsewhere; but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: [Provided further, That the tax so imposed under the laws of any State upon the shares of the associations authorized by this act shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares of any of the banks organized under the authority of State where such association is located:] Provided also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

Now, section 5219, as amended in 1868, reads as follows:

SEC. 5219. Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by an authority of the State within which the association is located; but the legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject only to the two restrictions, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the occasion for this amendment is brought about by a decision last year in the United States Supreme Court in the case of the Merchants' National Bank of Richmond, Va., against the city of Richmond. The courts of last resort in Virginia sustained a tax assessed by the city of Richmond in the year 1915 in form against the plaintiff in error in the National Banking Association against the shareholders, overruling the contention based upon the Constitution and laws of the United States. Now, the Merchants' National Bank of Richmond felt that the city of Richmond was practically beyond their right under the law, and they brought this action and the case was tried, and when the bank presented the facts in the case to the lower court I believe there was an unintentional misstatement of the facts, but those statements were not disputed by the opposition, and the case was finally carried up to the United States Supreme Court. Except for the fact that there had been a misstatement of these facts in the case, I do not believe that this case would ever have come up to the Supreme Court, but the fact that they were not, and the Supreme Court made this decision, has brought about a situation which is particularly troublesome in a number of the States.

I believe it was stated to the committee that some 27 States are affected by this decision. The result has been that many banks have employed counsel and brought suits, or have paid their taxes under protest, and a large amount of money or taxes is being held up in the various States and a serious line of litigation is in progress, and more is threatened. Now, when this matter was called to the attention of the Banking and Currency Committee it was requested by some of the tax commissioners of the United States that the committee take some action thereon. At the same time the bankers involved in the situation were very much agitated, and when these different interests appeared before our committee and asked for relief the chairman took it upon himself to suggest, both to the tax commissioners representing the affected States and the representatives of the banks, that if possible they should get together and agree upon a corrective resolution, so that the Banking and Currency Committee could feel that both of the interested parties were in agreement. Following that suggestion, the tax commissioners and the representatives of the banks got together here in the city of Washington and held several conferences thereon. They were not able, however, to iron out their differences on one or two points, and at the request of the tax commissioners I introduced a bill in the House, prepared by the tax commissioners, representing their views. But the same was objected to by the representatives of the banks as an infringement upon their rights and taking away from them rights which they had had since the original statute was formed in 1864, and which had been in operation since 1868 without any question whatever.

The committee held extensive hearings. We gave very wide latitude to both sides in the controversy and a very voluminous hearing was had, and finally, after very careful consideration by the committee, and the committee coming to no decision thereon, the chairman appointed a subcommittee, which went into the situation very, very carefully, and as a result of the deliberations and the report of that subcommittee I introduced last week in the House H. R. 11939, which is the committee's solution of this very complex tax problem as brought about by this Richmond decision. which is the bill now before us.

The subcommittee, and finally the full committee, went into this new bill very extensively. Inasmuch as there is tied up in the litigation in the various States several million dollars which is supposed to be under the control of the taxing power, and being under the control of the States themselves, we were confronted with a very difficult problem. Many of these States collect this tax and provide for redistribution in the localities in which it is collected; in other words, local municipalities are to get this money. For the past two years in the State of New York, for instance, I understand that something like $16,000,000 worth of these taxes is tied up in litigation. In the State of Massachusetts something like $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 is involved in litigation.

Now, for the Congress of the United States to deliberately enact a piece of legislation validating laws which are passed by the States was quite a questionable problem for us to contend with. Other members of the committee have gone into that, and, being lawyers, are very carefully prepared to discuss that phase of the question, and we have tried so far as we were able to present a bill here which would accomplish what was intended to be accomplished without working any particular hardship on the banks and at the same time giving the States the right to levy equitable taxes in accordance with the previous law and modern conditions, as they are entitled to levy against the banks. Considerable of a controversy arose in the question of classifying the national banking association of the country in the same class as the State banks and trust companies.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. WINGO. It might be well for the gentleman to direct attention to the fact that the last section of the bill—the validating section—is not a validation by Congress, but it is a declaration of authority to the States to enact validating or back-tax laws that will settle the controversies that are now in court involving assessments that have been attacked. In other words, the Congress does not undertake to validate or pass a back-tax statute, but the Congress undertakes to authorize States to validate.

Mr. WALSH. What is the difference between Congress validating it or Congress saying to the States that they can do it? Can the States do it without Congress's permission?

Mr. WINGO. I think not; and I think the law now authorizes it, but this is disputed.

Mr. WALSH. Then there is not any difference?

Mr. WINGO. Of course, if the gentleman does not grasp the difference on the mere statement I have made, I doubt if I can make him understand it.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas to explain to me the difference between Congress authorizing the State legislatures to validate taxes that are now in litigation and Congress doing it?

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I think I see what is bothering the gentleman. He overlooks this fact, that the legislatures of the States have no authority to levy a tax on these shares of stock except by specific grant by Congress of power to do it, because the national banks are agents of the Federal Government, and the early cases decided that the States could go no further than the permissive grant given by Congress.

Now, the question of this validation grows out of this kind of a situation: The assessment and the collection of taxes in New York and in Massachusetts, and possibly in some other States, has been attacked in the courts by some of the banks on the ground that it violates the permissive statute of Congress. Now, the last section put in here, the validating section, does not propose that Congress validate any assessment, but it does this: It will prevent the banks after this act is passed, through their attorneys in court, from resisting a supplemental assessment that might be made under the present authority of law in Massachusetts or in New York; or if the Legislature of Massachusetts, which is now in session, or of New York, which will be in session later, should find that they are afraid that their assessments on these banks are void for any reason, then they can pass a supplemental assessment act, or a back-tax assessment act, and then if the lawyers come and say that the power given by Congress in the first instance was only a power to assess at the regular time of the assessment, and therefore that the supplementary assessment was not valid, this act here would remove that legal quibble.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, the gentleman has demonstrated clearly that there is not a particle of difference between Congress validating the act itself and passing an act providing that the State could do it, because in the absence of a grant of power from Congress the States in this matter could not act.

Mr. WINGO. No. The gentleman is a very able lawyer, but there is a difference here which he does not seem to see. Congress has no power at all to levy a tax on a bank for State purposes. If it has no power to levy a tax on a bank for State purposes, then it has no power to validate an assessment of tax that has been made or levied. All on earth that Congress can do is to point out, through the permissive grant to the States to tax a Federal agency, the limitation of the extent to which the State might go.

Now Congress has passed a general statute. Lawyers say that that statute must be strictly construed, and that if a legislature or State taxing power fails to make a valid assesment at the regular assessment time the State can not by a back-tax act reach them, and that the banks could actually escape. There is a difference of opinion among lawyers about that.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think paragraph 3 of this bill is constitutional?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, nobody has raised the question of constitutionality of our act in authorizing the State to do it. I took the position that it was not constitutional for Congress to validate the tax, but that we could, under the power to fix the limit to which the State might tax, authorize the State to a certain extent to levy a back tax.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state that he believes it is within the power of Congress, under the Constitution, where a tax has been paid under protest and a suit is now pending in a State court, for Congress to pass an act and say to the State legislature, "You can validate that tax now if you want to"? That is what is done in this act. That is what paragraph 3 says, which is the validating paragraph.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman overlooks this point, that the legislature has no authority to tax national banks, save as the act of Congress authorizes it. The gentleman will agree that we had constitutional authority to authorize the State legislatures to tax national banks in the first instance, does he not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. All right. If we have that constitutional authority, then have we not by the same line of reasoning the same constitutional authority to authorize them to levy a back tax to cover a failure?

Mr. WALSH. I do not believe so, in view of the decision of the courts.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The time to do that is when the tax is assessed.

Mr. WINGO. The State can levy a back tax. The gentleman's State of Texas can levy a back tax.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In the original instance, but this is not the original instance. The time for levying the tax has lapsed.

Mr. WALSH. At the time when this tax was originally assessed and levied the party against whom it was assessed made a protest, and a suit is now pending. Now, is it constitutional for Congress to come in and say, "You can validate that tax"?

Mr. WINGO. The only duty that Congress owes to the national bank is——

Mr. WALSH. The question is whether Congress can interfere with litigation that is pending in a State court by coming in with an original or additional grant of authority.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is getting down to the effect of it. I do not believe that the gentleman, if he will reflect for a moment, will doubt the power of Congress to prescribe by a permissive statute to a legislature, either by a general act or by a back tax act or a validating act, the tax to be assessed on shares of a national agency, a national bank. That involves a question of policy.

Mr. WALSH. I have doubt about the power.

Mr. WINGO. I make no pretense to any extraordinary knowledge on this subject, but I give the gentleman the benefit of the hearings and the discussion, and I am trying to tell him what the effect will be.

Mr. WALSH. My question was as to the constitutional power.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman asked me if Congress could interfere in a lawsuit in the State. That is one of two reasons why the committee put in section 3, to help the gentleman's State of Massachusetts and to help the State of New York. That is the only purpose of section 3. They have brought suits there. My candid judgment is that they can win some of the suits if they are tried properly.

Mr. WALSH. Who? The States?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; the States. In other words, the banks will lose. But suppose the State court of Massachusetts, or the Federal court, should ultimately hold that the assessment and the attempted collection and the payment under protest of taxes by a bank in Massachusetts failed because it violated section 5219? Then unless Congress has this power and unless Congress exercises the power set out in section 3, granting permission to the States to make a back tax levy, that bank would absolutely escape any tax whatever for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, the years in question, if the contention of some lawyers is correct.

Mr. WALSH. That is what the bank was seeking to do when it paid under protest.

Mr. WINGO. No; I do not believe that. I know there was not a single representative of any bank in Massachusetts who said the banks would object to a fair tax. None of them said they wanted to take advantage of a technical failure of the State to exercise its power properly and to defeat the tax entirely. I do not think there is a single bank in the gentleman's State that will object to a validating statute enacted by the Massachusetts Legislature that will tax the banks upon the equality basis that is prescribed in section 1 of the general law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] will permit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is bothering me in connection with the legal power the gentleman is asserting is the question, What is the constitutional authority to clothe a State with the right to make retroactive an invalid law?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman understands that, in the first instance, we could grant to the States the authority to tax national-bank shares to any extent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. WINGO. All right. If we have unlimited authority to authorize the State to tax in an unlimited manner, then does not the whole include the lesser?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but I doubt if we have that unlimited authority.

Mr. WINGO. Then the gentleman's previous answer was incorrect. This is a Federal agency.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will take the decisions of the courts, he will find that the power of taxation over national-bank shares by the States is in the absolute control of Congress, and the States get only such authority as we specifically grant to them. Now, if Congress has the power to authorize them to make a levy at one time, does the gentleman think the Constitution will prohibit making a levy at another time for the same purpose?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The thing that is worrying me is the right to make it retroactive.

Mr. WINGO. It is not retroactive.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Your bill provides that, does it not?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no. They will not pay more taxes than were bona fide due under the law at the time. They will have the authority to validate a correct levy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was assuming that it was possible that the State courts might hold that the levy was invalid.

Mr. WINGO. All right. Suppose they do hold that the levy was invalid. Then we permit the States by this legislation to make a valid assessment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the gentleman thinks Congress has the right to go that far, does he?

Mr. WINGO. I think Congress has the right to permit the legislature of the State to make a valid assessment on the shares of national banks, just so long as they do not discriminate against them under the protective rule that Congress has laid down.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] has the floor.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Right in connection with what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has been saying, some gentlemen seem to be troubled by the fact that this legislation will have a retroactive effect. In reference to that matter I will say that in the consideration of the subject of taxation before the Ways and Means Committee the question of whether there was any constitutional objection to the imposition of a retroactive tax has often come up, and the consensus of opinion has been that there was no constitutional objection thereto.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended an additional hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he control two hours of debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there are no two hours of debate on a House Calendar bill on Calendar Wednesday. This is a bill being considered in the House.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time be extended one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as he understands the legal situation that exists in New York State with reference to this matter, just what it will be necessary for us to do in order to straighten out that situation?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I would like to make a brief further statement in connection with this. I want to be perfectly frank with the House.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is an important matter and a very interesting one.

Mr. McFADDEN. These litigations that have arisen are all subsequent to the decision "of the Richmond case" of the Supreme Court. We have in this country some very clever lawyers who are constantly watching the decisions of the Supreme Court. When the decision in this Richmond case was handed down, some of these lawyers immediately took up with their banks the question of their legally paying these taxes. As a result these suits were started. I do not know of a single instance where a national bank was protesting about the payment of its taxes in New York or Massachusetts prior to this decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I can cite the gentleman an instance where they paid it under protest years before.

Mr. McFADDEN. Those are exceptional cases; practically since 1868 the banks have been paying the tax under the law without any protest. Now, to answer the gentleman's question, my understanding is—and I will confirm what the gentleman from Arkansas has said regarding the third section in this bill—that this was put in largely to help out the situation in New York and Massachusetts and was done at the instance of the taxing representatives from those States. My understanding is that by the passage of this bill, as construed by the best tax authorities of New York State, they will be able to secure legislation in New York, and my understanding is that legislation is now pending there to correct this situation. They feel that without the validating clause they will be unable to correct the situation in New York State. The problem is very vexing to them because it ties up large sums of money which would be returned and in some instances have been returned, and each municipality will be obligated to return the money.

To illustrate, I understand that to cite the case of the city of Rochester, N. Y., it has borrowed all the money under the law it can borrow. There has been paid back as their share of this tax two or three million dollars. Now, if the city of Rochester is forced to return that tax it presents a very embarrassing situation. A similar situation presents itself in many other localities.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. VOIGT. Do I understand that if a State for three or four years back has levied a tax against national banks which was unlawful under the Richmond case that the State may now pass a statute legalizing that tax for three or four years back?

Mr. McFADDEN. Back to January, 1917. That is the reason we put the limitation on it. We wanted to deal with the cases brought about by this special decision. At first we wanted to go back to 1918, but we found that Massachusetts would not be able to collect its tax tied up in litigation, so we went back to January 1, 1917.

Mr. VOIGT. What I want to find out is, is it intended to give the State power to pass a retroactive tax law against national banks?

Mr. McFADDEN. To the extent of going back to January, 1917, if you call it retroactive. A tax was levied prior to the Richmond decision. What we are trying to do is to cooperate with the State so that they may make legal these taxes that are tied up and get it into the Treasury for distribution.

Mr. VOIGT. What I want to get at is this: Let us say a State has been taxing national banks for several years under what it supposed was a correct law, but was determined unconstitutional under the Richmond decision. Can the State pass another law which will put a proper tax on the banks for four or five years back?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not understand they can levy a higher tax than they levied before, but the States can legalize a tax that has already been assessed. I do not understand that they could levy a higher tax.

Mr. VOIGT. I understand that. But suppose the State had a law that was unconstitutional under the Richmond case. Can the State now enact a law under this to collect those back taxes under section 3?

Mr. McFADDEN. My understanding is they could.

Mr. SNELL. They could collect the tax already assessed.

Mr. VOIGT. It does not validate the tax that has been levied, but provides that when they enact a law——

Mr. WINGO. It does not validate anything. It authorizes the State to validate a fair tax levy that for any technical reason has failed. It gives the State specific grant of power to do a proper thing which may have failed by reason of some mistake of the tax assessing officers or the manner of taxing.

Mr. VOIGT. The point I am getting at is this. This admits of the legalizing of certain taxes. Suppose Wisconsin had for the last five years a law which levied a certain tax on national banks. That law is found to be unconstitutional. Now, under subdivision "c" can the State of Wisconsin pass any law which will collect the taxes from the national banks for the past five years?

Mr. WINGO. The effect of the case which the gentleman mentions would be this. Your State could pass a back tax and make a proper nondiscriminatory levy on the national banks for the back years provided they did not go contrary to the general rule laid down in section 1; and if they did so, the attorney for any bank that might seek to escape could not set up the legal quibble that Congress only granted authority to the States to tax by a general levy and gave them no authority to cure the defective levy by a special or supplementary levy.

Mr. VOIGT. It seems to me that if it is the intention by this bill to give the State of Wisconsin, or any other State, the power to reassess an appropriate tax for several years back, this language will not give the State that power. Notice the reading of subdivision 3:

That the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States heretofore in force shall not prevent the legalizing, ratifying, or confirming by the States of any tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman has not read all of it.

Mr. VOIGT. This only allows the State to legalize a tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed.

Mr. SNELL. These taxes have all been levied or assessed, have they not?

Mr. VOIGT. I know, but you can not legalize those taxes because they are not in harmony with paragraph 1 of that section.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman did not read all of subdivision 3. It reads:

heretofore paid, levied, or assessed upon the shares of national banks, or the collecting thereof to the extent that such act has been or is in accord with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this section.

In other words, it authorizes them by proper legislation to ratify an assessment to the extent that will be reasonable and fair and just.

Mr. VOIGT. What I want to see is a retroactive law which will make these banks pay their just taxes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Even though the court had held and adjudged that the tax was illegal?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; for the reason that it violated section 1.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is not what it says.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the effect of it. I would like to get the benefit of the gentleman's opinion upon that. If the court held the tax invalid it would be because the tax was levied prior to the permissive grant of Congress which is contained in section 5219. This would enable the legislature then not to ratify or confirm that tax in its entirety that the court had held had violated section 1, but to legalize and collect to the extent that it is permitted, and which the court has said would not be in violation of section 1.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it was in accord with the provisions of section 1 and the court has passed upon it and held that it was legal, then this act would validate that tax.

Mr. WINGO. I think it would.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact and was it not disclosed in the hearings that while there are a great many suits pending there are only a very few cases where the taxes were paid under protest prior to the suits being instituted?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALSH. What can be the harm of an amendment exempting from the provisions of section 3 those cases where the taxes were paid under protest and suit was brought?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman want to be fair to all?

Mr. WALSH. I want to be fair to the person who was awake, who was alive at the time the payment was made, and who raised the question.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman wants to protect the few big banks.

Mr. WALSH. Why should we protect people who slept on their rights?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman wants to favor the tax sharks. We want it to apply to all alike.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; a lot of people in Wisconsin went to sleep and paid this money, and they are coming now to Congress to get it back.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. We pay our just taxes in Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH. I would like the gentleman to answer my question. The gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the gentleman need not be disturbed about the regular order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me.

Mr. McFADDEN. To answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, we have been trying to deal with this intricate problem in a manner that is just, and as the gentleman says, a few of these banks that paid taxes, paid taxes under protest. The great majority did not. What we are trying to do is to provide means whereby the States can collect the tax from these banks, and the banks themselves are not disputing it; they are ready to pay a legal tax. Unless we have this language in section 3, these banks are going to escape the payment of their legal taxes for this period of time. I realize that it is a very delicate point constitutionally, and that lawyers probably can find a flaw in it.

Mr. WALSH. If the banks were not disputing this tax, why were they paying it under protest?

Mr. McFADDEN. Under the advice of very clever lawyers, I presume.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell us how many banks paid it under protest—what proportion of them?

Mr. WALSH. I understand only one in Massachusetts, and less than six in New York.

Mr. SNELL. And these are the very largest banks, are they not?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. In the first place, lawyers differ about the effect of the validating section of this bill. Many contend that the States have already the power to pass correctional legislation. In one respect at least, section 3 of the bill before us is a limitation, because it provides that you can not go further back than January 1, 1917, in any validating act to be passed. Whether it does accomplish the purpose or not is beside the question asked a moment ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The answer to that is this: No matter how you construe this legislation, it can not do anything more than let the States levy upon the national banks such taxes as were authorized by the Federal statute originally. If we do not validate as to those banks that have litigated we would have this situation; that the banks in a State, which, without question and in deference to the enactments of their legislatures and in patriotic desire to meet the responsibilities resting on them, come forward voluntarily and pay their taxes would be worse off than the banks that refused to accept and abide by the legislation of their States. In other words, we would put a premium upon the effort of banks to litigate and test out the right of the States to tax them. We would let those that resort to the courts to question the validity of the taxes assessed against them escape entirely, while banks that are inclined to respect the laws of the State and pay their taxes would have to meet the burdens put upon them.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEAGALL. In just one moment.

This law is not retroactive in any true sense of the word. All that is undertaken to be done is to enable the legislatures to levy against all banks just such taxes as the Federal statute authorized half a century ago, and such as other people were paying and what the banks themselves are willing to pay.

Mr. SNELL. If we adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, we would be protecting a few big banks to the detriment of the banks that have paid the taxes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is correct in that. The large banks have attorneys who look out for these things, whereas the country banks are not always alive to the situation. The country banker who was in the habit of paying his taxes under this statute was probably not advised of this Supreme Court decision. The case in Massachusetts is one of the larger banks. I believe it is the First National Bank of Boston.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose the court should decide against the banks, how would it be protecting the banks? In New York, and Massachusetts also, where would there be any protection to the banks?

Mr. McFADDEN. If the court does not decide against the bank, it would get out of the payment of the taxes.

Mr. WALSH. It should be decided by a legally instituted proceeding brought by people who are desirous of the right.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts evidently wants the big banks protected and to have the little banks escape.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert in the RECORD at this point the Supreme Court decision in this case of the Merchants' National Bank, of Richmond, Va., against the city of Richmond.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The decision is as follows:

Supreme Court of the United States. No. 240. October term, 1920. The Merchants' National Bank of Richmond, Va., plaintiff in error, v. The City of Richmond. In error to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia.

(June 6, 1921.)

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court.

The court of last resort of Virginia sustained a tax assessed by the city of Richmond in the year 1915, in form against plaintiff in error, a national banking association, in substance and effect against its shareholders, overruling a contention based upon the Constitution and laws of the United States. To review its judgment a writ of error has been sued out and allowed, and application has been made also for the allowance of a writ of certiorari. The proceeding originated in the Hustings court of the city of Richmond with a petition filed by the bank against the city to correct the assessment as erroneous. The first hearing resulted in an order granting the relief prayed for, upon grounds not now material; but, upon review by the supreme court of appeals, this was reversed (124 Va. 522), and the case remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views of that court; in consequence of which, correction of the alleged erroneous assessment was refused by the trial court, and the proceeding dismissed. An application for a writ of error to review this judgment was denied by the supreme court of appeals, with the effect of affirming the judgment of the Hustings court.

The tax was imposed pursuant to an ordinance approved April 9, 1915, passed under the powers conferred upon the city by its charter and an act of the general assembly approved March 15, 1915 (Virginia acts 1915, ch. 85, p. 119). The opinion of the court of last resort shows that plaintiff in error drew in question the validity of the ordinance and statute, as construed and applied, upon the ground of their alleged repugnance to section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the court sustained their validity notwithstanding. Under section 237, Judicial Code, as amended by act of September 6, 1916 (ch. 448, 39 Stat. 726), a writ of error is the appropriate process for reviewing the final judgment in this court, and the petition for allowance of a writ of certiorari will be denied.

It will not be necessary to recite the provisions of the statute and ordinance beyond saying that, taken in connection with another act of the general assembly, approved March 17, 1915 (Virginia acts 1915, ch. 117, p. 160), they authorized the imposition for the year 1915 upon banks, stocks, State and National, of a tax for State purposes at the rate of 35 cents and a tax for city purposes at the rate of $1.40—a total of $1.75—upon the $100 of valuation, while upon intangible personal property in general, including bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, the State rate was 65 cents and the city rate 30 cents, an aggregate of 95 cents, upon each $100 of valuation.

The bank's petition alleged, and the evidence showed without dispute, that in the city of Richmond, in 1915, city and State taxes at the rates first mentioned were imposed upon national bank stocks (including that of plaintiff in error) to the aggregate value of more than $8,000,000, and stocks of State banks and trust companies to the value of $6,000,000 and upward, while taxes at the lower aggregate rate of 95 cents per $100—city tax 30 cents, State tax 65 cents—were imposed for the same year upon bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness aggregating $6,250,000. It is to be inferred that a substantial part of this aggregate was in the hands of individual taxpayers; the precise amount does not appear. It also was shown by evidence without dispute that moneyed capital in the hands of individuals invested in bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness comes into competition with the national banks in the loan market.

Neither of the State courts passed upon this evidence or made findings of fact thereon; doubtless because, under their respective views of the applicable law, the facts referred to were immaterial. But this omission does not relieve us of the duty of examining the evidence for the purpose of determining what facts reasonably might be, and presumably would be, found therefrom by the State court if plaintiff in error's contention upon the question of Federal law should be sustained, and the facts thereby shown to be material. (Carlson v. Curtiss, 234 U. S. 103, 106.)

The Supreme Court of Appeals entertained the view that the purpose of section 5219, Revised Statutes, was confined to the prevention of discrimination by the States in favor of State banking associations as against national banking associations, and that since none such is shown here there was no repugnance to the Federal statute. This, however, is too narrow a view of section 5219. It traces its origin to section 41 of the act of June 3, 1864 (ch. 106, 13 Stat. 99, 111–112), in which, besides the restriction that State taxation of the shares of national banking associations should not be at a greater rate than that assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, there was an express proviso that the tax should not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares of State banks. But this was modified by act of February 10, 1868 (ch. 7, 15 Stat. 34), in a manner which, as was pointed out in Boyer v. Boyer (113 U. S. 689, 691–692), precluded the possibility of an interpretation permitting the States, while imposing the same taxation upon national bank shares as upon shares in State banks, to discriminate against national bank shares in favor of moneyed capital not invested in State bank stock. "At any rate," said the court, "the acts of Congress do not now permit any such discrimination." In the amended form the provision was carried into the Revised Statutes as section 5219, which prescribes that State taxation of shares in the national banks "shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State."

By repeated decisions of this court, dealing with the restriction here imposed, it has become established that while the words "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" do not include shares of stock in corporations that do not enter into competition with the national banks, they do include something besides shares in banking corporations and others that enter into direct competition with those banks. They include not only moneys invested in private banking, properly so called, but investments of individuals in securities that represent money at interest and other evidences of indebtedness such as normally enter into the business of banking. In Evansville Bank v. Britton (105 U. S. 322, 324) the court said: "The act of Congress does not make the tax on personal property the measure of the tax on bank shares in the State, but the tax on moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens. Credits, money loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations are more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ. Undoubtedly there may be much personal property exempt from taxation without giving bank shares a right to similar exemption, because personal property is not necessarily moneyed capital. But the rights, credits, demands, and money at interest mentioned in the Indiana statute, from which bona fide debts may be deducted, all mean moneyed capital invested in that way. * * * We are of opinion that the taxation of bank shares by the Indiana statute, without permitting the shareholder to deduct from their assessed value the amount of his bona fide indebtedness, as in the case of other investments of moneyed capital, is a discrimination forbidden by the act of Congress."

And in Mercantile Bank v. New York (121 U. S. 138) the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, after reviewing previous decisions and pointing out (p. 154) the policy and purpose of the act the key to its proper interpretation, proceeded to declare (p. 157): "The terms of the act of Congress therefore include shares of stock or other interests owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money. The moneyed capital thus employed is invested for that purpose in securities by way of loan, discount, or otherwise, which are from time to time, according to the rules of the business, reduced again to money and reinvested. It includes money in the hands of individuals employed in a similar way, invested in loans or in securities for the payment of money, either as an investment of a permanent character or temporarily with a view to sale or repayment and reinvestment. In this way the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is distinguished from what is known generally as personal property." Proceeding then to quote the passage we have cited from Evansville Bank v. Britton, supra.

In Amoskeag Savings Bank v. Purdy (231 U. S. 390–391) the above-mentioned declaration of the court in Mercantile Bank v. New York (121 U. S. 138, 157), including the citation from Evansville Bank v. Britton, was repeated, and it was pointed out that the rule of construction thus laid down had since been consistently adhered to.

No decision of this court to which our attention is called has qualified that rule or construed section 5219 as leaving out of consideration the rate of State taxation imposed upon moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens invested in loans or securities for the payment of money, either for permanent or temporary purposes, where such moneyed capital comes into competition with that of the national banks. Thus in Bank of Commerce v. Seattle (166 U. S. 463, 464) the precise ground of decision was the want of a showing that "the moneyed capital left unassessed was, as to any material portion thereof, moneyed capital coming into competition with that of national banks." To the same effect National Bank of Wellington v. Chapman (173 U. S. 205, 219). In the present case there is a clear showing of such competition, relatively material in amount, and it follows that upon the undisputed facts the ordinance and statute under which the stock of plaintiff in error was assessed, as construed and applied, exceeded the limitation prescribed by section 5219, Revised Statutes, and hence that the tax is invalid.

Application for writ of certiorari denied.

Judgment reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Brandeis dissents.

Test:

Clerk Supreme Court United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the gentleman think of having it incorporated in the report?

Mr. McFADDEN. The report is printed separately, but I thought it better to have it in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition, unless there is some one opposed to the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, this question has given the Banking and Currency Committee a great deal of trouble. I do not know of any question that we have gone into more carefully and given more extensive hearings on than on this bill. The decision in the Richmond case, according to my view as a lawyer, did not lay down any new proposition at all. With all due respect to the lawyers that tried that case, representing the city of Richmond, I think they were in error when they practically stood on a demurrer to the bank's petition. In other words, they practically demurred to the allegation of the petition of the bank, because they did not introduce any evidence to contradict the assumption that the city of Richmond was taxing at a lower rate moneyed capital that was in the hands of private individuals in the city of Richmond. My understanding is that if they had not stood on the false theory of the law they could have introduced proof that would have met the allegation of the bank's petition and the bank's proof and the court would have decided differently.

Now, if you lawyers would take the Mercantile Bank case and other cases and note the line of decisions, I venture the assertion that every one of you would agree that the decisions of the courts of the United States have been fair and uniform from the beginning down to and including the Richmond case. And what we do by this bill is that we only change really that part of the rule governing the assessment and tax of the shares of national banks by the States, as found in subsection (b), line 8, on page 2. That provides:

That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed upon the net income derived from such other moneyed capital, such State may in lieu of a tax on the shares impose upon the bank an income tax, assessed upon the net income of the bank, but such tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed from the net income of such other moneyed capital.

In other words, we say, to conform to the old general rule, they must not discriminate against the national banks by levying a greater tax upon the shares of national banks than would be levied on the income of an individual citizen of the State or the income of the two. In other words, we simply broaden the statute, not as to the extent that you can levy but to the classification of your taxing system in the State. So that those States which have seen fit to discard the old general property tax and undertake to classify their taxation and provide for a tax on incomes in lieu of a property tax, the States may do that, just so they conform to the nondiscriminatory rule laid down in the law, which has been the law for a long time.

Mr. VOIGT. I want to ask the gentleman what is the use of using all this involved language in paragraph (b), which says:

That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed upon the net income derived from such other moneyed capital—

And so forth. Why do you not just say that if a State has an income tax applicable to the banks in general such a tax may be levied on the national banks?

Mr. WINGO. Because that would be contrary to the existing law and contrary to the views of the committee.

Mr. VOIGT. The bill provides for an income tax on income derived from moneyed capital. I understand that to be the rule at the present time.

Mr. WINGO. The wording of the statute has been defined by the court.

Mr. VOIGT. Yes. But does not the gentleman think that the State ought to be given the right to tax a national bank to exactly the same extent and in the same manner, and without discrimination, as it taxes its own State banks?

Mr. WINGO. It has that power. They have the power now, this does not disturb it.

Mr. VOIGT. The State is certainly not given the power by subdivision (a) of section 1.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is a lawyer?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. That does not give the States power. The States do not derive from Congress power to tax State banks. If they are going to discriminate against banks, would you have Congress undertake to regulate the State legislatures and protect State banks, too?

Mr. VOIGT. No. I am talking about what is attempted to be accomplished by this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Show me in this bill anything that lays down a rule on a legislature in assessing or taxing State banks. It does not cover that question at all.

Mr. VOIGT. No; but this bill attempts to convey power to the States. In the absence of a statute of course the State would have no power to tax a national bank, because it is a Federal agency. This attempts to delegate that power to the States. It seems to me the only fair rule would be this, to give the States the power to tax national banks to the same extent and no further than they tax State banks within their own borders. This bill does not do it.

Mr. WINGO. I gather what the gentleman means. In other words, you want to do this: You want to make it possible for the State to permit private bankers to be taxed less than national bankers?

Mr. VOIGT. No.

Mr. WINGO. I did not mean to say that the gentleman wants to do that, but that is the effect of his suggestion.

Mr. VOIGT. No. What I want to do is this: If there is a bank in a town in my State that is chartered by the State that has a capital and surplus, say, of $150,000, and in that same town there is another bank chartered by the United States which has the same amount of capital and surplus and does practically the same business, I want those two institutions to pay the same amount of tax to the State, and this bill does not do it.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no. This bill does this: This bill does not restrict the State to that narrow limit. You might do this: You might have the situation arise in some States—because it has arisen—and it is true that some States exempt private bankers from taxation and make their national banks and State banks bear the entire burden. Why should J. P. Morgan & Co. be taxed less than that which is paid by a State or National bank in New York City?

Mr. VOIGT. If the gentleman asked me that question, I should say that J. P. Morgan & Co. should pay the same tax as other bankers do; and if they do not do it, then something should be inserted in this bill to make them do it, and you have the power to do it.

Mr. WINGO. But what right has the Congress to tell the State of New York what they shall tax bankers? The gentleman objects to moneyed capital in the hands of private individuals being the rule. You want the limitation to be capital invested in State banking institutions?

Mr. VOIGT. Banking in general.

Mr. WINGO. Now, if you limit it to that, then the question would come in—because it has actually arisen by experience—whereby men who are practically engaged in the banking business, but not technically so, but are in direct competition with the State banks and with the national banks, might be exempted entirely from tax on their moneyed capital, whereas a State institution or a national bank, a Federal institution trying to compete with them, will be compelled to bear a greater part of the burden of taxation in that community than they ought to. Under this bill we do not change the present existing rule except as presented in subsection (b). We retain the rule that they must not discriminate in favor of moneyed capital in the hands of private individuals in the States.

That is in the law now, and we decided almost unanimously in the committee to bring it forward in this amendatory bill, and the only change that has been made in the present law, which has been interpreted by the Supreme Court in numerous cases, which is clear, and which the banks understand, and the State taxing commissions understand, and which every lawyer understands who has studied it, we will not disturb that, but we will simply say this: We will say to these States that seek to have a progressive system of taxation by substituting an income tax in lieu of a property tax, if the States want to do that we say, "All right; if you want to do that, do it, except that in levying that income tax you must make the measure the same; that you will not discriminate in favor of the moneyed capital in the hands of private individuals in your State engaged in banking."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago to the effect that in the State of New York private bankers like J. P. Morgan & Co. did not have to pay a tax.

Mr. WINGO. No. They pay a lighter tax. In other words, the State law discriminates in favor of the private banker in New York, according to our information, and against the State banker and the national banker.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman to say that they did not pay any tax.

Mr. WINGO. No; I did not mean to say that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In subdivision (a) of the first section it is stated—

That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of such State coming into competition with the business of national banks.

Most of the States assess moneys and credits in the hands of individuals at a less rate than they assess other property, including bank stock. For instance, here is a man who has $1,000 or $10,000 that he loans to his neighbor. On that class of loans there is a smaller assessment. Under the bill as it stands how are you going to compel the national banks to pay the same tax that the State banks pay? Are you not limiting it to a rate of levy upon moneys and credits in the hands of individuals who may loan their savings?

Mr. WINGO. The decision of the Supreme Court determines that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. But this is the decision.

Mr. WINGO. I happen to be associated with the gentleman, and I know something about his legal ability, and I am satisfied that if the gentleman will study the Richmond case he will say that the lawyers made a mistake in not traversing the allegation of fact in the plaintiff's petition and meeting the testimony supporting the allegations.

The decision in the Richmond Bank case does not lay down a single new principle. The Supreme Court decided that case on the fact that the bank alleged and offered evidence in support of the allegation that the city of Richmond taxed at a lower rate several million dollars of money capital in the hands of individuals in competition with the banks, and the city offered no testimony to refute that allegation and proof. In other words, they admitted themselves out of court. They admitted that the city of Richmond was permitting certain money lenders who were in direct substantial competition with the banks to be taxed at a lower rate than the banks were taxed. They admitted themselves out of court when they admitted that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The lower court made no findings upon those facts.

Mr. WINGO. The lower court of Virginia went off on a different theory than the Supreme Court of the United States did, as I now recall. If the gentleman has studied that decision, he will see that the Supreme Court said in as polite a way as they could, although they did not say it in so many words, but the gentleman can see that in discussing the matter privately the judges said to one another, "Why, that lawyer just admitted his case out of court by not traversing the allegation that there were $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 of moneyed credits in the hands of private individuals, in direct substantial competition with the banks, that were taxed at a lower rate than the banks were." When they did not traverse that allegation every lawyer recognizes that it is the same as if the city of Richmond had filed a general demurrer to the complaint and stood upon that.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. This measure is particularly for the purpose of correcting the manner of taxing national banks, not specially to take care of private banking institutions. What would be the objection in section 1, after the word "capital," to amend by saying "employed in the business of banking," instead of the language used in the present bill?

Mr. WINGO. There would be this difference. There might be some competition of a substantial character, and the courts have held that it must not be any little incidental thing. They look at the facts of each particular case. The only variation in the decisions is because there was a variation in the facts disclosed in the different records. If the gentleman undertook to limit it to banking institutions, he might meet with that difficulty.

Mr. SNELL. In the banking business, I said.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman will notice in lines 6 and 7 on page 2 we put the test—coming into competition with the business of national banks.

In other words, if the gentleman will permit, this gave us lawyers in the committee a good deal of concern.

Mr. SNELL. It certainly did.

Mr. WINGO. And here is what we decided. We took all the decisions, and every one of us lawyers agreed that the Supreme Court in that long line of decisions had not varied from the general principles first laid down. We all agreed that the apparent differences in the decisions grew out of different facts in the record in each case. We said, "The Richmond case has not announced any new principle. It just simply happened to wake up a lot of lawyers and bankers and started this litigation." Now, we did think that the request of the State taxing commissioners that we amend the law should not be granted, but growing out of the discussion in the hearings before the committee it developed that some of the States are getting away from the taxing system of general property taxes and adopting an income tax. Now, the question was raised whether or not they had authority to do that under section 5219; so we said, "We will stand by the present law except that we will permit the States to use the alternative system." So we did not undertake to change the law by this bill in any other respect, and used this language—"coming in competition with the business of national banks."

Mr. SNELL. Is it not the interpretation of that language that caused the trouble?

Mr. WINGO. No; we used that language because the Supreme Court of the United States had used it and defined it, and the decisions in the cases have disclosed what the courts will hold to be the measure as defined by that language.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think there is no trouble about that language?

Mr. WINGO. We think there will be no trouble. I will be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I think we could use language that would be simpler.

Mr. SNELL. It would be simpler to me.

Mr. WINGO. But it would be new language. We thought it would avoid litigation and be safer for the banks themselves if we took language that had been specifically interpreted in cases involving the taxing of national bank stock, by the Supreme Court of the United States. We thought we would not disturb the present rule, but just simply broaden the method by which that rule was followed in State taxation so as to permit the alternative of an income tax instead of a general property tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have had some difficulty as to whether the phraseology of paragraph (b) of section 1 will cover the existing taxation system of my own State of Wisconsin. Paragraph (b) says:

That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed—

But in Wisconsin we have not enacted a State income tax law in lieu of the property tax. We have enacted it supplemental to the personal property tax. The personal property tax is enforced, but if a person pays a personal property tax he may deduct it from the income tax; but if the personal property tax is greater than the income tax, he has to pay the excess as levied on his personal property.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the gentleman's question is this: Why do we not permit the States to use both systems, one supplemental to the other, instead of taking the alternative?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the phraseology should be changed so as to meet the condition where the income tax law is supplemental to the property tax, as in the State of Wisconsin. We have not discontinued the personal property tax in Wisconsin. We have supplemented it. My suggestion to the gentleman is, after the words "in lieu of a tax on the shares," to insert the words "or as supplementary thereto."

Mr. WINGO. Candor compels me to admit that personally I hold to the view of the gentleman. I think if a State wants to levy a general property tax which is right, and supplemental thereto also to have an income tax, the State ought to have that right; but the fact was brought to the attention of the committee, either in the public hearings or in private conversation with some of these experts, that discrimination in effect might arise, and my contention in that regard was somewhat overcome by the possibility of using these dual systems as a means whereby a real discrimination in effect might be made against the bank stock and in favor of private moneyed capital.

Personally I was in favor of giving the States the broadest latitude. I think the correct rule is recently stated in one of the New York cases, and I think the Supreme Court may yet uphold it. It was in effect that you must consider the entire taxing system of a State, and if in the last analysis the tax burden, however it may be made, under whatever classification, if the tax burden that is finally collected is nondiscriminatory, if it levies on the bank no greater burden than it levies on other property, the bank can not complain because the State adopted one scheme for getting the tax of one group and another scheme for getting it from another group. The committee disagreed with me and I agreed to this, as it is about the best we can agree on.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether the phraseology in the bill as reported will bring any relief to the State of Wisconsin, to the tax commission under the existing taxation system, because the income tax law is not in lieu of the personal property tax.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is proceeding on the theory that Congress has the power to grant relief to States, when the only duty which it has to discharge in this regard is to be sure it will restrain the States from discriminating against the Federal agencies, to wit, the holders of shares in national banks. If your State wants relief it can get relief by its own act; it is not the business of Congress to give it relief.

Now, I will be frank with the gentleman—personally I would be willing to permit the supplementary system, but the committee was against me on that, and this does permit your State to adopt the alternative system if it wants to, and does not hold it down to the general property tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not bring the relief to the State of Wisconsin so that we can place the taxation of national banks on a parity with State banks.

Mr. WINGO. I think you can get your tax by using either one of the two methods.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming that a bank in 1918, which was three years before the Richmond decision, paid its tax under protest and brought suit, and did likewise in 1919 and 1920. That is before the Richmond decision and before the litigation was instituted. Why should we make the power that we are conferring on the legislature seemingly retroactive so that these people in 1918, before the Supreme Court decision on this question, when they paid under protest and brought suit—why should we say that the States can validate that tax?

Mr. WINGO. While we do not do that, I understand what the gentleman means is, What is the necessity for section 3?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know why, if there are only a few instances, why not let the court settle those cases instead of Congress saying that we will find against the plaintiffs.

Mr. WINGO. If I thought that section 3 was a finding in fact or in law against either party, I would not be for it.

Mr. WALSH. It is in effect; it says that the legislature can validate the tax.

Mr. WINGO. That is the gentleman's interpretation; I do not give it that interpretation.

Mr. WALSH. If that is not the case, does the gentleman contend that the legislature can not validate the tax that is now subject to litigation?

Mr. WINGO. No; I do not; but better lawyers than I am do. I am going to be perfectly frank with the gentleman. This section 3, while it was drawn by the gentleman's colleague, Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, was put on the bill at my insistence. The subcommittee reported sections 1 and 2. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] preferred other language. Now, the committee settled the dispute between the subcommittee report, which is all of the bill down to section 3, and other proposals. It voted largely in favor of the subcommittee's conservative report, which would do nothing more than make a change I have pointed out.

I suggested that while the original bill introduced provided for the direct validation by Congress, and while I was opposed to that because I did not believe Congress could do that, I was willing to go this far in order to grant relief to Massachusetts and New York. And for the purpose of settling the lawsuits and for the purpose of enabling the litigants of these two States, the State commissioners, and the attorneys for the banks to get together I am going to make the same candid statement to the House that I made in the discussion before the committee on the legal provisions. I said personally I believed the State of Massachusetts, if the court should hold that the legislature for 1918 which the gentleman mentioned, that it was wholly void—I do not care for what reason—I believe the State Legislature of Massachusetts could enact a back-tax statute authorizing whatever agency in that State makes an assessment, authorizing that agency to extend for the next year along with other taxes for the current year, proper taxes for 1918 that had been held to be void. I believe that the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts could do that, provided that in making that levy they conformed to section 1 of the act—that is, section 5219—that the levy they made does not contravene that. Why? Because the court will have bottomed its decision on a finding of fact, that the invalid tax was void for one of several reasons, but for the purposes of this discussion for one reason only, and that is because it contravenes the rule laid down in section 5219. Then if the legislature sought to cover up that omission by a tax that came not only within the rule of section 5219 but within the rule laid down by the court, which must be the same, then I think the State of Massachusetts has that authority. However, a lawyer for whose legal opinion I have great respect, and other lawyers, have said to the contrary, and I think there is one lawyer connected with one of those bank litigations who says that should the State lose, and the State of Massachusetts should attempt to do that, or the State of New York—I do not remember which State he is from—then he would go into court and he would resist that supplementary or confirming statute or back-tax statute, whatever you call it, upon the ground that the State had no power to tax the shares of national-bank stocks by supplementary or confirming statutes and that it only got the power to tax them at all through an express grant from Congress when it enacted section 5219, and that section 5219 only permitted the assessment at the regular assessing time—in other words, a regular levy and a regular collection—and that it did not permit the States to make a confirming levy or a back-tax levy. I said to the committee that while I did not believe that position to be sound, that while I believed that any court would override it and would say that the Congress in enacting section 5219 had acted in the light of the constitutional powers of the several States to levy a back tax, yet the presumption was that Congress intended to put only one restriction and leave the States the power to tax in any way they saw fit, save and except the one limitation which would prevent discrimination.

But I said that if we can help the people of Massachusetts or the people of New York in any way that is within the power of Congress to adjust this matter amicably, then all right; and I suggested that section 3 would give these State representatives, the State taxing commissions, a club over these attorneys and banks, and would enable them to say to them, if you do not settle this on a fair basis, on a conceded nondiscriminatory basis, then we will undertake to enact further legislation by having the legislature pass a supplementary act that will be beyond any question within the limitations of section 5219. That would be one club. The other reason was that it would remove that legal quibble which I think was unfounded. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. What the gentleman stated I conceive is a proper motive, particularly where suits have been instituted since the Richmond decision, but where the persons who have been taxed have prior to that time been paying these taxes under protest, it seems to me questionable whether Congress could now step in and say that notwithstanding they raised this question before the Supreme Court of the United States determined it, notwithstanding they stood upon their rights and paid the tax under protest—and these instances are very few—yet that we shall say to the legislatures of the States, that they can validate, ratify and confirm, or make a further levy upon them, even though the case is in litigation. As to the cases where they paid the tax without question, or where they have instituted suits since the Richmond decision, I concede that the gentleman's position is sound, but it does seem to me that there may be some doubt as to the authority of Congress in the matter.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman will concede that the motive is good?

Mr. WALSH. I do not raise any question about that.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the gentleman raises the question of the power of Congress to do this?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; where the taxes were paid prior to the Richmond decision under protest.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will read the Richmond decision in the light of the other bank-stock cases, he will see that it does not lay down any new rule at all, but he will find it went off because the attorney for the city saw fit to stand upon a theory of law instead of traversing an allegation of fact, which allegation fitted the Federal statute, and thereby it took him out of court.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I wish to know whether I understand the gentleman correctly. If I understand the gentleman's argument, then I agree with his conclusion. In the first place, he says that this litigation that went to the Supreme Court of the United States relative to the Richmond tax of 1915 was decided finally upon the ground that the tax was a discriminatory tax.

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And that was the sole ground?

Mr. WINGO. In other words, it decided this, that it was alleged by the petitioner and proven, and not controverted by the other side, that there was some eight or ten or twelve million dollars of moneyed capital in the hands of private people in competition with the national banks of Richmond that was not taxed to the extent that the bank in question was taxed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The court seems to have put its decision upon the ground altogether that there was discrimination, and it is to be inferred that if it had not found discrimination it would have upheld the tax as a valid tax.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That, in the first place. In the second place, as I understand it, this final provision of this bill validates any tax that does not contain the feature of discrimination. That, in substance, is what it does?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; except I think the gentleman still overlooks the fact that this does not seek to validate anything. It says that the present existing law shall not prevent the States from validating, just so long as they do not discriminate, just so long as they follow the rule Congress has laid down.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That detail I included in the suggestion I made. The effect of the third section is to enable any State that has levied a nondiscriminatory tax to validate or collect it. That is the effect of the final section.

Mr. WINGO. The effect would be to enable them to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. To enable them to do it, and if that is all the legislation is clearly constitutional?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If that were not true, if the Congress of the United States was undertaking to enable any of the States to impose a tax collectible now, which the States had no right to impose in 1915, 1916, 1917, or 1918, then you would have very grave doubts as to the constitutionality of it?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think Congress could validate it. I said I do not believe that Congress has the power to directly validate or confirm; that all on earth Congress has the power to do is to permit the States, in other words, to say to the States that they may tax this Federal agency to a certain limit, not in a certain manner for a certain purpose, but for any State purpose you see fit, just so they do not discriminate. We will permit the States to tax, just so that they do not discriminate against the shares of stock in these Federal agencies.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand from what the gentleman has just stated it is not his idea that Congress could vest any new power of a retroactive character in the States?

Mr. WINGO. No.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is what the Supreme Court decided in the case of Forbes against the Board of Commissioners of Everglades, decided in April of this year. The opinion says:

> But general ratification of an act is not good if attempted at a time when the ratifying authority could not legally do the act.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will notice, I would not have agreed to subsection 3 if there had not been these words in it, "to the extent of," and so forth. In other words, if the Legislature of Massachusetts should pass a confirming or back-tax statute to the extent of holding taxes to the extent of the law covered by section 1, and which was in existence at the time this void assessment was made, then we would take away from that bank the alleged right it had under the old law to plead that no assessment could be made except at the regular period for all assessments.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In other words, this bill in substance redeclares the law.

Mr. WINGO. We redeclare the law, and we simply remove a legal quibble by simply saying that they shall not set up a legal quibble, because Congress did not in the first instance say to them that they could make a back levy.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not mean to say that Congress is redeclaring the law?

Mr. WINGO. That is what we are doing.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman means that he is saving from the wreck of the Richmond decision what was not scrapped?

Mr. WINGO. I think everybody by common consent, when we went into the Richmond decision, put it aside.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Richmond decision is the reason for this legislation. Does the gentleman say the legislature of any State would have the right to legalize and confirm without Congress specifically conferring the authority by some legislation?

Mr. WINGO. I think so; just so——

Mr. WALSH. What will section 3 add?

Mr. WINGO. I think the States have the power now. But good lawyers think they have not the power, and I think that that section is a declaration by Congress, that there was no intention in enacting section 5219, which we reenact here in this vital part, to say to the States that they are limited to the assessment of the collection at the regular period, and that they have the right to cure a defective levy by a back tax or confirmation statute.

Mr. WALSH. Is that the reason for the peculiar language of paragraph 3, that it shall not prevent the legalizing, and so forth?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly that was the object. Section 3 was drawn to meet an objection I made to the original proposition, that Congress had no power to do this itself. I think it would be unfortunate to leave Massachusetts or New York in such a position that some bank might escape its just proportion of tax in those States, I think it is the duty of Congress, now that we have the question before us, to make it clear, that so far as Congress is concerned the Congress did not intend by restrictive powers to tie the hands of New York and Massachusetts. I thought it was impossible to settle these matters in the committee, and I was willing to say to the States that they should have the power to levy these taxes just so they keep within the well-settled and judicial interpretation of the rule, so that they do not discriminate against these banks in favor of any moneyed capital in those States. Let the States adopt any tax system they want. All that Congress ought to do is to say that they shall not discriminate against Federal agencies. Why should I in Congress say to Massachusetts or Arkansas or New York or Arizona what kind of tax system they should have? Let them have their own taxing system, just so they do not tax out of existence the Federal agency by discriminating against it. I think that is a sound rule that the Congress should follow.

Mr. DUNBAR. I agree with the statement the gentleman has just made in regard to the object of passing this bill, but I would like to know something in detail regarding its operation. Under the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes I understand that the national banks of the State of Massachusetts will be permitted to retain or to recover $16,000,000 worth of taxes which Massachusetts has supposed it would collect from these national banks. Now, under section 3 will it be possible for the State of Massachusetts to collect that $16,000,000?

Mr. WINGO. Provided that $16,000,000 is a correct amount, measured by section 1. In other words, here is the practical difficulty that confronts Massachusetts and New York: Most of these towns and communities have taken this money and have spent it, and they are up against it. That is the reason why, instead of saying they could pass a back tax statute that could legalize it to a certain extent, so that in passing the law they would not be said to be passing a back taxing statute, it could be said to the communities and cities that collected this tax that they could retain a certain measure, provided that measure and that extent did not go beyond the rule laid down in section 1. That would be the effect of it.

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes. I understand that most of the money has been spent by the States of Massachusetts and New York, so that it is going to be a matter of very serious embarrassment to those States if they are compelled to refund to the national banks the amount of money which they have collected for taxes under section 5219. Am I correct?

Mr. WINGO. Well, if I followed the gentleman, I think he is, but I was somewhat diverted at the moment.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, under the provisions of this bill, taking the State of New York, for instance, where private capital is almost exempt from taxation, national banks and State banks will be put upon the same basis of taxation, but they will not be put upon the same basis of taxation as compared with capital in the hands of private individuals. Am I right on that?

Mr. WINGO. I see what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. DUNBAR. Am I right on that?

Mr. WINGO. No; I think not. The gentleman proceeds on a different theory, and, as I think, upon an erroneous theory. What the State of New York does is its own business.

Mr. DUNBAR. I know. I want to come to that later.

Mr. WINGO. I have yielded already more time than I intended to. I promised to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. The gentleman from Indiana made a false assumption there. He said this would permit so and so. If the State of New York wants to permit the private banker to pay less than his proportion as compared with the national bank, it has that right, but Congress can say, "So far as you seek to tax the national banker in a discriminatory manner you shall not levy upon the national banker any greater burden than you levy upon the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals engaged in the banking business. Now, how can they get that relief? Either by the New York Legislature amending the law so as to put the national banks and State banks on the same basis as private bankers, or else by putting the private bankers on the same basis as the national banks and the State banks.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am aware of that, but I want the gentleman to answer a specific case. Take the case of J. P. Morgan & Co.——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] will answer that. I have used more time than I intended to use. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 14 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from South Carolina was on the subcommittee that prepared this bill, and he is familiar with the question raised by the gentleman from Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to have 30 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question? Then he can answer at any time during the course of his statement.

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. DUNBAR. Under the provisions of this proposed law it is optional to the State of New York to assess National and State banks on a par with capital in the hands of private individuals. Am I right?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, another question: Under the provisions of this bill National banks and State banks in the State of New York would be assessed no more for taxation than J. P. Morgan & Co. and other private bankers in the State of New York. Am I right?

Mr. STEVENSON. Not entirely. To a certain extent you are right, and to a certain extent you are not right. I will come to that.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman permit another question? Then I will ask no more.

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. DUNBAR. Under section 3 provision is made that the State shall not be prevented from legalizing or ratifying or confirming by the States any tax heretofore paid. Now, the State of New York under section 3 can ratify any tax law which they have had in existence heretofore that made National banks and State banks pay more taxes than was paid by capital in the hands of private individuals?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that is the gentleman's conclusion, which is entirely wrong, because he did not read the entire proviso. The entire proviso is that they are not prevented from ratifying or confirming any tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed upon the shares of national banks, or the collection thereof, to the extent that such tax has been or is in accord with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this section, which is that it must have been levied not at a higher rate than other moneyed capital coming in competition with it, if levied on the value, or must not have been levied at a higher rate on the income than the levy that has been made on private capital coming in competition with it.

So much for that. Now, as to the other question, about J. P. Morgan & Co. and others of that kind, the tax must be equal. That has always been the holding. There must be an equal burden laid upon the stockholder of the national bank and the holder and user of other moneyed capital coming in competition with a national bank. It is not "all other moneyed capital." For instance, they exempted capital invested in real estate mortgages in one State, and it was held that that did not apply because there was a sound public policy for that, to wit, that they were taxing the mortgage and taxing the land, making a double tax, and therefore they had the right to exempt from taxation, and did exempt from taxation, large amounts of property as a homestead exemption, and that did not destroy it; but it must be capital coming in competition with the national banks. Now, the gentleman refers to J. P. Morgan & Co. I will state frankly that I was opposed to putting in section 3 here, because if States violate the law, as they did here, they did it in contravention of the act of 1868.

I was opposed to putting it on so as to interfere in any way with that; but as section 3 is written it merely gives them the authority in case any levy is declared to be void, because of illegal levies heretofore made, when the banks are about to escape all taxation, then that the legislature may provide for the taxation of those banks; but the legislature must provide for taxation within the scheme of this act and thereby collect the back taxes. Now, nobody wants any institution or individual that ought to pay taxes to escape the payment of taxes, and as I say, I did not favor putting this on, because the legislature has that power already. There is no doubt that where a tax levy is held to be void the legislature can then impose a legal tax in a legal way and collect it for the period which the taxpayer was about to escape; and the only effect of section 3 that amounts to anything is this: That in making the new levy they can either levy it on the income or on the value. That is the only effect, except that it limits it to the year 1917. They can not go back of that in levying these taxes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a short question there?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. For several years the national banks have been sending to their stockholders an urgent request that they file an affidavit stating any indebtedness that they may owe as an offset or a reduction of the tax they are to pay. Does this do away with that?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; it does not. It has been held since the Britton case, in One hundred and fifth United States, right up to this date that if you tax them ad valorem the stockholder has the right to deduct his indebtedness from the value of his bank stock and pay a tax upon the balance only.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The bank pays the tax.

Mr. STEVENSON. The bank pays the tax; but the value is reduced by the amount of the indebtedness of the taxpayer and stockholder, provided he shows that he has no other credit against which to offset that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Was that based on a system of taxation heretofore under which the national banks paid their share of the tax for roads, schools, and so forth?

Mr. STEVENSON. That was based on the theory that they must be on the same level with all the other moneyed capitalists competing with the national banks, and that if the other moneyed capital in the hands of an individual was allowed to deduct the individual's indebtedness when he returned his credits, and to return only the balance, then the stockholder of the national bank had the right to do the same thing. Some States allow that and some do not, and therefore it is different in different States.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Why did the committee fix on 1917?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the time back within which this controversy arises in the States of Massachusetts and New York. Frankly, that is the reason.

Now, to come to the question of Morgan & Co. and others, this proposition is one that had a great deal of popularity when it was first brought to our committee—that the people had unwittingly gone along and assumed that the taxation of national-bank stock was all right, provided it was not taxed higher than State-bank stock. That was the law when the national banks were created. In 1864 they put that very thing in the law, and in the case of Boyer against Boyer, in One hundred and thirteenth United States, decided in 1884, you will find that that question was explicitly met, and the Supreme Court explicitly said it was not equality with the other banks that was required, but that it was equality with the individual owner of capital in competition with it that they proposed to enforce.

Now, as I say, in 1864 when Congress passed the national banking act, they created that equality and said that the tax must not be higher than the tax on State bank stock. Well, what happened? A lot of lawsuits sprung up. In the first place a great many States had banks of issue and other banks, and they provided that those banks should merely pay a bonus to the State instead of paying any tax. A great many others provided that when the State bank returned its stock for taxation it had the right to deduct all the United States bonds and State bonds which it held, and the result was that the State banks in those States paid nothing. They just went out and invested in United States bonds on the 31st day of December, and on the 1st of January they paid no tax. The result was that the tax levied by the States upon the national bank stock was knocked out wherever that point was raised.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Not only that, but they had what they called greenbacks, which they held for years, and toted them around from one bank to another when the necessity arose.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and that resulted in their changing the law so that it provided that the equality must apply to the individual who owned capital and used it in competition with the national banks. That has gone along and been determined by the Supreme Court at least twenty-five times, and the Supreme Court has always held the same on that question.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. VOIGT. I want to ask the gentleman what is the objection to passing a plain statute that every one can understand, providing that a State shall have the right to tax a national bank to the same extent and no more than it taxes State banks and private banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Here comes the very proposition that I was laying down. A good many of the States at one time allowed, and a good many of them yet for that matter allow, the State banks to deduce from the value of their stock the value of their nontaxable bonds that they hold, for instance United States bonds, and therefore the State bank would be absolutely exempt from paying any tax, and so would the national bank if you passed an act in that form.

The other proposition is this. Everybody believes in the taxation of banks; there is no doubt about that. The tax gatherer is after them; as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] said some time ago, he sits on their front doorsteps all the time. Under the equality clause of the Constitution of the United States you can classify the property of taxpayers into classes, and you can tax one class higher than another; you can tax one class in a different way and not violate the clause that requires you to give equal rights to all. Now, you put the National banks and the State banks all in a class by themselves, and what have you got? Why, you will say to the tax gatherer, "Go to it." Do as they did in the State of South Dakota, put 15 mills on them and 5 mills on other credits. They would say, "Go to it and tax the banks, for they have no friends; they have the money, and you can make them shell out." Well, now, we did not propose to do anything of the kind. We propose to say to the individual that puts his money into the national bank that he shall stand equal with others. Is there any reason for that? Where would your Federal reserve system be if you discriminated against the national banks in taxation and going to the point of driving them out of business? The foundation of the Federal reserve system is the national bank. When you allow them to be discriminated against the Supreme Court has said, it is to preserve them against unfriendly discrimination, and if you drive the national banks out, you undermine the Federal reserve system and all systems of credit.

Let me show you how it will work. Take the State of New York, and a good many people have been clamoring and abusing the Committee on Banking and Currency as a set of bankers. It is 20 years since I owned a share of stock in a national bank. I own $600 of shares in a State bank, and that is all the connection I have, but I have always been as zealous in taking care of banks as anybody when they were right.

What was the situation in New York? They got into a lawsuit over there and the representatives of the State of New York proposed as findings of fact to the court, which the court approved, and let me read you to show where the justice comes in. These are the court's findings:

During the year 1921 the operations of national banks consisted of receiving deposits, discounting commercial paper, making loans on collateral securities, and buying and selling corporate obligations such as bonds and notes, and dealing in acceptances, dealing in negotiable securities issued by Governments, such as Government bonds, municipal bonds, and State bonds, buying and selling foreign securities and issuing circulating notes as money; and with the exception of issuing circulating notes such operations were engaged in by individuals or moneyed corporations other than banks and trust companies in competition with national banks, the amount of capital invested in the business of private banking in this city being over $200,000,000, such private banking houses, including J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Speyer & Co., J. & W. Seligman, Hallgarten & Co., Ladenburg, Thalman & Co., Goldman, Sachs & Co., and Blair & Co., generally, not invariably, composed of individuals doing business as partnerships and mostly partnerships. (S. M. pp. 58, 59, 60, 62, 63.)

Now, how were they taxed? The banks were levied upon by a tax of 10 mills, 1 per cent, of the value of their stock, and their stock, mind you, has always been valued high enough. How were the $200,000,000 of the private bankers taxed?

Three per cent on their income. Now, let us figure that out a minute. Here is a national bank with $100,000 capital invested, and they tax it 10 mills, or 1 per cent, $1,000. Here is Morgan with $100,000 of his capital involved in a deal. He makes 10 per cent, or $10,000. They tax him 3 per cent on that—$300. How much fairness is there in that? Is not that what the Supreme Court says when it speaks of building up an unfriendly competition by unfriendly legislation to national banks?

That is not the only case in New York they are litigating, and let them fight it out as far as I am concerned. Now, what is the situation in Boston? Boston is represented by a very distinguished gentleman, Mr. LUCE, who is on this committee and on the subcommittee. Mr. LUCE states that the national banks in Massachusetts paid $2,999,000 last year; but if they had been assessed the same as Lee, Higginson & Co., Kidder, Peabody & Co., and others who occupy the same place in Boston that Morgan does in New York, they would have paid $490,000, a difference between $490,000 and $2,999,000 against the national banks in one State alone. Now, you will say very readily that the States will never discriminate in an unfriendly way, but they are doing it. We propose merely to give them the right if these levies are declared to be invalid to put a valid tax on these banks and collect it, and that is what section 3 means and nothing else. That is the principle we establish, and it will have to stand if we expect to maintain the great financial institutions of this country. If we expect to maintain the Federal reserve system, we have got to let these national banks live, we can not discriminate against them.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I agree with the statement the gentleman has just made, but what would be the objection to amending section 1, subdivision "a," by inserting after the words "moneyed capital" the words "used in banks or similar operations"?

Mr. STEVENSON. What is the objection to the words that we have put in there, which are the words of the Supreme Court—coming into competition with the business of national banks?

We are adding those words as an explanatory part of the sentence. The language the gentleman suggests is untried language, while the other is settled, determined by the Supreme Court, reaffirmed up to the Virginia case last year, language that has always stood the test.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. In certain States, prior to the Richmond decision, these taxes were paid under protest and suit was brought. Is it the gentleman's understanding or contention that before the legislature can ratify or confirm a tax where litigation is pending, the litigation must run its course?

Mr. STEVENSON. No. There are certain limitations in validating a tax.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. It must be in accord with paragraph 1.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are other limitations.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think where a bank, for instance, was watchful, and three years prior to the Richmond decision had paid a tax under protest and brought suit that Congress should now step in and say to the legislature that it can validate that tax if it wants to?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is exactly what the gentleman from South Carolina has always objected to, and there is nothing in this act that provides for it. Those people will have to pay their legitimate tax whether we pass anything here or not, and this section is put in there to satisfy some people that they can go back and get a valid tax from these people, if they get it back on their controversy now in the courts.

Mr. WALSH. And there is nothing to prevent it in the absence of section 3.

Mr. STEVENSON. Nothing in the world. I have maintained that all of the time. Mr. Speaker, the question that we have to determine—and we have given a great deal of thought to this—is whether we will make any progress in the taxation systems in this country. I think everyone agrees that there should be no discrimination against the national banks in favor of people competing with them. There is another thought in that connection. The State banks are a very important factor in our financial system, and the States will never levy a heavier tax on the State banks than they will on the national banks; but if you put them in a class by themselves, then it will go up and up and up. As long as you protect the national banks from the unfriendly legislation which puts a heavier burden upon them than on the private banker you are protecting the State banks also, because the legislature of no State can stand up in the face of its constituents and say that it will tax State banks higher than it will tax national banks. Therefore by retaining the law as it is you get absolute justice for all the banking institutions of this country, and none of them want any more, so far as I know, and none of them should have any more.

We say that no measure of taxation should be ironclad, that there is progress in the affairs of humanity, that there is progress in the affairs of government. Many of the States are resorting to the taxation of income instead of the value of the property. They are doing that because they can get at the income where a man can cover up his investments. When it comes to his income, he has to be mighty smart if Uncle Sam and the States together do not find out what the income is. Then they get much more tax from the fellow who shaves notes when they tax his income.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. In a moment. We say to any State that desires to be progressive, that desires to tax the income instead of the corpus of this investment, of this capital in the hands of individuals, you can do so, but you are not allowed to tax the income higher than you tax the income of individual citizens who make their living in the same way. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. My question relates to a statement of a while ago, to the effect that the State would not tax the State banks higher than the national banks. Can the State tax the national banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. The State, by authority of national law is given the right to tax the stock in a national bank, and that is the statute about which we are having this controversy. The rule laid down in 1868 was that they could tax that stock, but that they must not tax it at a higher rate than they tax other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals in the State coming in competition with the national banks. In other words, that the private banker must pay at the same rate as the national banks.

Mr. FESS. I am asking purely for information. In the case of McCullough against Maryland was the question of taxing the State involved?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that involved that question, and it was held that that was an instrumentality of government, and that it could not be taxed without the consent of the Government. When the national bank act was passed, the same point was made, and it was expressly put in there that the State should have the right to tax the stock of national banks, and they have always done it; but the Congress put this limitation in, that in taxing that stock the States should not tax it at a higher rate than they did the capital in the hands of individuals which came in competition with it. That is a result of it. We propose now by this amendment to allow them to tax either the share itself or the net income of the national bank, where they tax the income of the other moneyed capital in lieu of taxing the capital itself.

Mr. FESS. I have just come into the Chamber, and the argument of the gentleman throws a light upon the subject which has been in considerable doubt in my own mind. Is it not possible, if this is permitted, that a State may entirely destroy a national agency?

Mr. STEVENSON. That was the decision of Congress, and it has been the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, but they say that you can not tax it at a higher rate than you tax other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual, and when you place that safeguard there, then, if you undertake to tax it so as to forfeit it, you have the individual to deal with, and the tax that runs above the individual tax will be held to be null and void.

Mr. DUNBAR. Suppose in a State there were this kind of law, that capital in the hands of an individual was taxed 1 per cent, that State banks were taxed 3 per cent; in the event of this bill becoming a law national banks would then have to pay no more than the tax assessed against capital in the hands of individuals, which would be 1 per cent; then the tax against State banks would still remain at 3 per cent. Is that right?

Mr. STEVENSON. That would be right, and that is a matter for the State to regulate. If a State has a legislature with no more sense than to so discriminate against its institutions, the people would tend to it the next time. But that is not our concern. It is our concern that the State has ample right to tax the national banks as much as it does and in conformity with what it taxes other capital. And if the State sees fit to enact freak legislation which destroys its own institutions we can not help it. There are 48 States in the Union, and we can not legislate in conformity with the vagaries of all of them.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then it is the contention that if a State taxes any of its institutions out of existence it is none of our concern, just so long as they do not discriminate against national banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. So far as our power goes, it is forbidden them to tax a national agency out of existence. If they do that, if the States were so unpatriotic as to tax State institutions out of existence, they have got to take care of that themselves. I will give you an instance of that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEVENSON. In the State of North Dakota—and you will see it in the hearings—they established a State bank, which was not taxed at all. Then they passed a law to take the money out of the other banks in the State and put it in that bank—money that was for any public business at all; I believe $33,000,000. They put a tax of 15 mills on the value of all the bank stock—and I believe it was 5 mills that they put on personal property and 5 mills on real estate, but exempted to each man $2,000 worth of real estate and took off the value of the improvements, so that when they went to assess a man's farm they took off the value of the improvements first and then cut off $2,000, and assessed him the balance at 5 mills. The hearings will show whether or not that is correct, but that is my recollection. What was the result? They ruined nearly all the banks in North Dakota. And it was done to promote the interest of this great State institution and drive out of existence all of the other banks. Now, that is the shining instance of what States might do under certain circumstances if we should let down the bars and tell them that they can tax this national agency in any way that they please.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. Under the laws of the State of New York national banks can be assessed no more than capital in the hands of private corporations. Then the national banks will probably be assessed at about 1 per cent?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are assessed by law at 1 per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. At 1 per cent?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir. The law fixes it absolutely. The curious thing about it is that they have a provision in there that bank stocks shall not be assessed at a higher rate than moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. They have copied the statute of the United States, and after they got into trouble they went and repealed that part of it. That is the situation as to the legislation in New York, and it shows you we can not legislate with reference to the legislation of every State. What we have got to do is to lay down a fair, square, upright rule that the States shall tax without discrimination and stand against that discrimination and stand by that rule.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENISON. When was that law passed in North Dakota?

Mr. STEVENSON. In the last three or four years.

Mr. DENISON. Was that done by the Nonpartisan League?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. You will find it in the hearings. Mr. Devitt, of that State, gave us a thorough history of it, and we know from the newspapers what happened.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman was not at all surprised that it was done by the Nonpartisan League?

Mr. STEVENSON. That may be, but who knows where the Nonpartisan League will break out? Who knows where partisanship or a man will undertake to destroy the agency that is the foundation of the Federal system and the foundation of our currency system? Therefore we can not legislate because some State is getting its fingers burnt by reason of the fact that she has tried to do something which is picturesque. We have to legislate for our institutions and give them a square deal as between them and other moneyed capital.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am in accord with everything the gentleman says, but I am wondering if this will give equity to all the national banks in the United States in the matter of taxation?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Supreme Court of the United States says there is no law that will give absolute equality in the matter of taxation. They will shade valuation, so that inequality will necessarily arise; but the intention of Congress was that a fairly equitable assessment and levy should be made and collected on the national banks, and that beyond that no State has the right to go.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman did not allow me to complete my question.

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. DUNBAR. If this bill becomes a law——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, when the national bank act was so amended in 1864 (13 Stat. 111) as to allow the States to tax shares in national banks, it was provided that they should not be taxed at a higher rate than shares of stock in any of the banks organized under the authority of the State where the national bank was located. Under this law many difficulties arose and the case of Lionburger v. Rouse (9 Wall. 468) reached the United States Supreme Court. As a result of these difficulties and the decision in that case the act was amended in 1868 (15 Stat. 34), and the measure as it stands to-day was adopted making other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals the measure instead of State bank stocks.

As time went on the question was raised in Pennsylvania as to whether "other moneyed capital" meant other bank stock or other capital generally doing competitive business. In Boyer v. Boyer (113 U. S.), at page 695, sums up the decisions to that date—1884—which will be found instructive, and on page 702 the court decides the question squarely that it is not the tax levied on State banks but on "other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals" which must measure the tax rate on national-bank shares.

The decision has been the same all the time from that day to this. In the case of Weaver (100 U. S. 539) they had held that rate of taxation meant burden, and if the rates levied were the same but the assessed value was greater on bank stock than on "other moneyed capital" the vice was there. They held that exemption of notes secured by real estate did not destroy the right to tax bank stock, as it was only partial and justified by public policy, and so of savings banks and county, State, and municipal bonds, and all are discussed in the Boyer case. On page 694 it lays down this rule or construction: "The intention of that statute" was "to protect corporations formed under its authority from unfriendly [italics used by court] discrimination by the State in the exercise of its taxing powers."

In Supervisors v. Stanly (105 U. S. 305) this equality with the individual was emphasized by holding that where the taxing officers refused to allow a stockholder to deduct his indebtedness from the amount of his stock and be taxed only on the balance when that right was allowed the individual capitalist the assessment was void. This was followed by the case of Brittan (105 U. S. 323). So the law was settled, and has been ever since, that it was the burden laid upon capital in the hands of individuals that measured the burden that could be laid on national-bank stock.

Then the question arose as to what is "other moneyed capital." This question reached the Supreme Court in 1886 in Mercantile National Bank v. New York (121 U. S. 138), and they then defined it on page 156, as follows:

> The business of banking, as defined by law and custom, consists in the issue of notes payable on demand, intended to circulate as money where the banks are banks of issue; in receiving deposits payable on demand; in discounting commercial paper; making loans of money on collateral security; buying and selling bills of exchange; negotiating loans; and dealing in negotiable securities issued by the Government, State and National, and municipal and other corporations. These are the operations in which the capital invested in national banks is employed, and it is the nature of that employment which constitutes it in the eye of this statute "moneyed capital." Corporations and individuals carrying on these operations do come into competition with the business of national banks, and capital in the hands of individuals thus employed is what is intended to be described by the act of Congress.

Then, after discussing the cases fully on page 161, the court says:

> It was not intended to cut off the power to exempt particular kinds of property if the legislature chose to do so.

And the court adds as to such exemptions:

> The only limitation, upon deliberate reflection, we now think it necessary to add is that those exemptions should be founded upon just reason and not operate as an unfriendly discrimination against investments in national-bank shares.

This, then, defined "other moneyed capital," and that has never been overruled or modified but has been followed 36 years without "shadow of turning." On page 155 the court says that the purpose was to prevent unfriendly and unequal competition.

The next question that arose was all moneyed capital incidentally used in the above, or occasionally used and in comparatively small amounts, embraced in the term "or only such as was in actual substantial competition with the banks"?

In Seattle Bank v. Seattle (166 U. S. 463) and in Bank v. Chapman (173 U. S. 205) that question is answered as follows (173 U. S., p. 213):

> The main purpose of Congress in fixing limits to State taxation on investments in national banks was to render it impossible for the State in levying such a tax to create and fix an unequal and unfriendly competition by favoring institutions or individuals carrying on a similar business and operations and investments of a like character.

And then concludes—

> The result seems to be that the term—

Moneyed capital—

> as used in the Federal statute does not include capital which does not come in competition with the business of national banks.

Then there was an acquiescence in that status from 1899 until the decision in the Bank against Richmond, and it held that the rule in the Mercantile Bank case (121 U. S.) and the Chapman case had not been modified, thus reaffirming these as follows:

> By repeated decisions of this court, dealing with the restriction here imposed, it has become established that while the words "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" do not include shares of stock in corporations that do not enter into competition with the national banks, they do include something besides shares in banking corporations and others that enter into direct competition with those banks. They include not only moneys invested in private banking, properly so called, but investments of individuals in securities that represent money at interest and other evidences of indebtedness such as normally enter into the business of banking. In Evansville Bank v. Britton (105 U. S. 322, 324) the court said: "The act of Congress does not make the tax on personal property the measure of the tax on bank shares in the State, but the tax on moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens. Credits, money loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations are more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ. Undoubtedly there may be much personal property exempt from taxation without giving bank shares a right to similar exemption, because personal property is not necessarily moneyed capital. But the rights, credits, demands, and money at interest mentioned in the Indiana statute, from which bona fide debts may be deducted, all mean moneyed capital invested in that way. * * * We are of opinion that the taxation of bank shares by the Indiana statute, without permitting the shareholder to deduct from their assessed value the amount of his bona fide indebtedness, as in the case of other investments of moneyed capital, is a discrimination forbidden by the act of Congress."

And in Mercantile Bank v. New York (121 U. S. 138) the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, after reviewing previous decisions and pointing out (p. 154) the policy and purpose of the act the key to its proper interpretation, proceeded to declare (p. 157): "The terms of the act of Congress therefore include shares of stock or other interests owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money. The moneyed capital thus employed is invested for that purpose in securities by way of loan, discount, or otherwise, which are from time to time, according to the rules of the business, reduced again to money and reinvested. It includes money in the hands of individuals employed in a similar way, invested in loans or in securities for the payment of money, either as an investment of a permanent character or temporarily with a view to sale or repayment and reinvestment. In this way the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is distinguished from what is known generally as personal property." Proceeding then to quote the passage we have cited from Evansville Bank v. Britton, supra.

In Amoskeag Savings Bank v. Purdy (231 U. S. 390–391) the abovementioned declaration of the court in Mercantile Bank v. New York (121 U. S. 138, 157), including the citation from Evansville Bank v. Britton, was repeated, and it was pointed out that the rule of construction thus laid down had since been consistently adhered to.

No decision of this court to which our attention is called has qualified that rule or construed section 5219 as leaving out of consideration the rate of State taxation imposed upon moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens invested in loans or securities for the payment of money, either for permanent or temporary purposes, where such moneyed capital comes into competition with that of the national banks. Thus in Bank of Commerce v. Seattle (166 U. S. 463, 464) the precise ground of decision was the want of a showing that "the moneyed capital left unassessed was, as to any material portion thereof, moneyed capital coming into competition with that of national banks." To the same effect National Bank of Wellington v. Chapman (173 U. S. 205, 219). In the present case there is a clear showing of such competition, relatively material in amount, and it follows that upon the undisputed facts the ordinance and statute under which the stock of plaintiff in error was assessed, as construed and applied, exceeded the limitation prescribed by section 5219, Revised Statutes, and hence that the tax is invalid.

It will be seen that there was no modification of the rules in the leading cases, and no surprise has been sprung on intelligent lawyers by this case, but the case was decided on the admitted facts that it was admitted that the capital carrying the lower rate was "in competition" and in substantial amount. Then it developed that the States of New York and Massachusetts had been violating this statute by taxing corporate banks, including national banks, 1 per cent on their book value and taxing other moneyed capital 3 per cent on the income, and the tax commissioners wanted a law passed to validate or allow validation of past levies and permission to continue this. It is sufficient to say that J. P. Morgan & Co. and other like concerns, as found by the courts in New York, last year used $200,000,000 of such capital with only a 3 per cent income tax in full competition with national banks who paid 1 per cent on the value of the stock. It is, if possible, worse in Massachusetts. The committee refused to countenance that program and reported a bill that allows the State in lieu of tax on value to tax on the net income, and that is as far as the House Committee on Banking and Currency would go. For further statement of facts see my remarks when the bill was on its passage, page 8729 et seq. of the RECORD, June 14, 1922.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF PAUL v. HARRISON.

Mr. DALLINGER, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a privileged report on the contested-election case of Paul v. Harrison, from the seventh district of Virginia, which was referred to the House Calendar.

STATE TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has discussed this bill with all the zeal and ability which was displayed by him in proving that Andrew Jackson was born in his State. [Laughter.] He has done both exceedingly well.

I want, however, to call the attention of the House to the language used by the Supreme Court in the opinion in the case of the Merchants' National Bank of Richmond against the City of Richmond, rendered by Mr. Justice Pitney, of the United States Supreme Court. In discussing the matter he says:

> The Supreme Court of Appeals entertained the view that the purpose of section 5219, Revised Statutes, was confined to the prevention of discrimination by the States in favor of State banking associations as against National banking associations, and that since none such is shown here there was no repugnance to the Federal statute. This, however, is too narrow a view of section 5219. I traced its origin to section 41 of the act of June 3, 1864 (ch. 106, 13 Stat. 99, 111–112), in which, besides the restriction that State taxation of the shares of national banking associations should not be at a greater rate than that assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, there was an express proviso that the tax should not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares of State banks. But this was modified by act of February 10, 1868 (ch. 7, 15 Stat. 34), in a manner which, as was pointed out in Boyer v. Boyer (113 U. S. 689, 691–692), precluded the possibility of an interpretation permitting the States, while imposing the same taxation upon national-bank shares as upon shares in State banks, to discriminate against national-bank shares in favor of moneyed capital not invested in State bank stock. "At any rate," said the court, "the acts of Congress do not now permit any such discrimination." In the amended form the provision was carried into the Revised Statutes as section 5219, which prescribes that State taxation of shares in the national banks "shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State. * * *

I want to call particular attention to the following language:

> By repeated decisions of this court, dealing with the restriction here imposed, it has become established that, while the words "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" do not include shares of stock in corporations that do not enter into competition with the national banks, they do include something besides shares in banking corporations and others that enter into direct competition with those banks. They include not only moneys invested in private banking, properly so called, but investments of individuals in securities that represent money at interest and other evidences of indebtedness such as normally enter into the business of banking. In Evansville Bank v. Britton (105 U. S. 322, 324) the court said: "The act of Congress does not make the tax on personal property the measure of the tax on bank shares in the State, but the tax on moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens. Credits, money loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations are more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ. Undoubtedly there may be much personal property exempt from taxation without giving bank shares a right to similar exemption, because personal property is not necessarily moneyed capital."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did they not expressly say that the rule laid down in the case of the Mercantile Bank against New York in One hundred and twenty-first United States, which was never modified, was the rule that had been followed? Did he not say that?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They do use that language. However, the language used in this decision is not found in the case cited by the gentleman. Therefore I say that the term in the bill here, "moneyed capital," is entirely too general to carry out the purpose sought to be accomplished by this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has the gentleman read the one hundred and fifty-sixth page of that Mercantile Bank case? That contains the exact language that the gentleman has referred to and more. It says:

> The business of banking, as defined by law and custom, consists in the issue of notes payable on demand, intended to circulate as money where the banks are banks of issue; in receiving deposits payable on demand; in discounting commercial paper; making loans of money on collateral security; buying and selling bills of exchange; negotiating loans; and dealing in negotiable securities issued by the Government, State and National, and municipal and other corporations. These are the operations in which the capital invested in national banks is employed, and it is the nature of that employment which constitutes it in the eye of this statute "moneyed capital." Corporations and individuals carrying on these operations do come into competition with the business of national banks, and capital in the hands of individuals thus employed is what is intended to be described by the act of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The decision from which I have quoted goes further than has been suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina. It will be observed that the language is "credits, moneys loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations," which the court states are "more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ." In other words, the definition given to "moneyed capital" in this decision is so broad that it would include loans from one individual to another, investments of individuals in securities that represent money at interest, and other evidences of indebtedness which in no proper sense enter into competition with banking.

If the decision does not expressly hold this, it at least foreshadows what may be expected by way of further definition in future decisions. True, the court modifies its language by stating that such evidences of indebtedness must be such as normally enter into the business of banking; but as long as we are legislating upon the subject it seems to me that we should make it so clear and explicit that there could be no future ground for argument in the matter.

If subdivision (a) of section 1 of the bill under consideration is amended as suggested by me to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] when he had the floor by inserting after "moneyed capital" the words "used in banking or similar operations," so as to read—

> 1. (a) That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital used in banking or similar operations in the hands of the individual citizens of such State coming into competition with the business of national banks—

I think the bill would accomplish the purpose of those who have been working for this remedial legislation.

As the bill now reads it is open to a construction which would put national banks in a favored position as against State banks in those States where moneys and credits in the hands of individuals not engaged in the banking business are assessed at a lower rate than bank stock and other personal property. For instance, in my State—South Dakota—farm mortgages are not assessed in the ordinary sense of the term, but the mortgagee at the time of filing his mortgage for record must pay a registry tax in lieu of other taxes, which is much lower than the taxes would be upon personal property of like value. This is also true in Minnesota and in a number of other States in the Union.

On May 2, 14 national banks in our State had started suits to recover taxes paid under protest. How many more there will be no one can tell, but if recovery is had the State will have to repay very large sums of money which have already been paid into the public treasury.

There has never been any discrimination in South Dakota in the assessment of national banks as against State banks, nor have State banks been unjustly assessed in comparison with other lines of business. National banks should be willing, and if not willing they ought to be required, to carry the same burdens as institutions within the State carrying on a like business. There has never been any favoritism shown in the matter of assessment and taxation to private bankers in the State. They are subject to the same rules and regulations and must in all respects comply with the requirements of the law applicable to State banks. Now that we are seeking to remedy the difficulty which has arisen it should be done in such a way as to leave no room for misunderstanding.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman from South Carolina took up most of my time. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the consideration of this bill I have been and am still in accord with the view suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. If I had my way I would leave the States free to work out their own tax problems in their own way. I can understand why it might be desirable to deal differently in matters of taxation with a banking institution which is a corporation and enjoys many privileges and benefits that do not obtain as to a mere individual in handling his private funds. But the Federal Government has the sole power to control the taxation of national banks, which are governmental instrumentalities or agencies, and it is desirable, if we are going to set on foot such institutions as national banks, to at least see that they are protected in the right to live and do business. So that, if we allow the States to make a difference between capital invested in banks and capital in the hands of individuals we should necessarily give them free hand in the taxation of capital invested in national banks, and in doing that we should put in the hands of the States the absolute power to destroy national banking institutions.

I do not know of any way by which we can grant any relief to the States in these matters further than is carried in the bill now under consideration. The Supreme Court, in construing this law, defines capital in the hands of individuals to be capital employed in substantial competition with national banks, so that if we attempt to limit the Federal statute in its protection to a requirement that capital invested in national banks shall be taxed only to the extent that similar capital invested in State banks is taxed, then we leave open all private banking institutions and all capital in the hands of individuals or employed by any agencies or instrumentalities other than State banks to be taxed differently from capital invested in national banks, and thereby pull down the bars for discrimination against capital invested in national banks.

I had the idea in my own mind and I attempted to work out a plan by which we could limit the application of the Federal statute to securing an equality of right as between national banks and other institutions engaged in similar business. But it is out of the question to frame an act in that way without failing to give the protection which it has always been considered desirable to give capital invested in national banks. The Supreme Court in construing the original act which put capital invested in national banks upon equality with other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals liberalized the act by holding other moneyed capital to be such as comes in substantial competition with capital invested in national banks. This is as good as we can make it.

Whenever we depart from the principles and the language used by the Supreme Court of the United States we shall wind up with a power left in the States to discriminate against capital invested in national banks. I take it that no one considers it wise to do that. No one takes such a position, so far as I know. It is highly important that the States be given power to tax capital invested in national banks, because without it State banking institutions would be destroyed or at least put at unfair and unjust disadvantage. So all agree that there should be no discrimination one way or another.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that the States have the right to discriminate between an individual who loans his own money and the stock in national banks, so long as there is no discrimination between the national banks, the State banks, and private individuals engaged in a like and competitive business?

Mr. STEAGALL. I think I answered the gentleman's question just a moment ago. The Supreme Court defines capital in competition with national banks as capital in substantial competition, and it is of no use to write a law saying that you can not discriminate against the stock or capital invested in national banks, and then make it possible for others by any method whatever to enter into substantial competition with national banks and tax them differently. So we decided that the only way to work out the matter, to get any relief at all, is the method expressed in the legislation which we now offer to the House, and I think it is the best that can be offered. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, with the first two paragraphs in this bill I am in hearty accord. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. LUCE], a member of the committee, is unable to be present and participate in the discussion of this measure to-day, although he has been very active during the hearings upon the bill, and I understand has participated in framing the same. If I mistake not he was a member of the subcommittee. His absence is due to the very serious illness of his wife, whom he is obliged to take away from Washington during the heated season.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has worked very industriously and helpfully in the preparation of this legislation, and it is a matter of regret to every member of the committee that he is not present to-day.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for that statement, and am sure that it will be very much appreciated by my colleague [Mr. LUCE].

The paragraph of this bill that has bothered me somewhat is the third paragraph; but as a result of the discussion that has been held here I have about arrived at the conclusion that the third paragraph is unnecessary, and that probably it will make no difference whether it is attached to the measure or not.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that that paragraph was prepared by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. WALSH. I understood that was the paragraph which particularly interested my colleague, as a result of the situation which exists in Boston and also with respect to some banks in New York.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say in that connection that my own view is—and I think it is probably the best opinion of the lawyers who discussed the matter before us—that this third section of the bill is really unnecessary, and that it accomplishes nothing, unless it does effect a limitation in that it provides that any legislation to cure defects can date back only to 1917. But the gentleman, as a lawyer, will readily understand that this provision of the bill might have some practical benefit in working out a solution of the litigation and controversies that have arisen in Massachusetts and elsewhere. It indicates a purpose on the part of contract which might command consideration. For that reason the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] wanted the third section in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that if there are institutions which prior to the decision in the Richmond case had been paying these taxes under protest and had instituted suits, I doubt whether we ought by act of Congress to authorize the legislatures of the States to step in now and determine those suits. It seems to me they ought to proceed in court to their natural termination.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The gentleman would not be in favor of permitting those banks to escape taxation altogether during that period, would he?

Mr. WALSH. Of course I would not, and those banks would not escape taxation altogether.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes; they would.

Mr. WALSH. They would not. The banks themselves do not maintain that position.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman does not mean to say that this act would determine those suits at all. This legislation proceeds upon the theory that the suits might be determined in favor of the banks, and in that event it provides that the former legislation shall not be construed as denying to the legislature the right to pass whatever legislation is necessary in order to collect from those banks the taxes which are authorized by law and about which there can be no controversy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON].

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I make bold to state here, as I did in the Committee on Banking and Currency, where this bill was framed, that the present form of the bill does not materially change the situation as it now exists. Indeed, I am of the firm opinion that it does not change the present situation at all, and that unless some amendments or modifications are made to the present bill it will do little more than to merely continue the present confused tax situation in the various States.

I take it that the only reason for any legislation on the subject is to bring about a condition that will make certain, in every State of the Nation, a square and equitable tax levy on all classes of capital employed in the banking business, be that private, State, or national.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that national banks in all States should ask for nothing more, and they should be granted nothing less than to be on a parity as to taxation with any competing capital employed in the banking business, be that private, State, or national, and our legislation here to-day should be not simply to reiterate or reaffirm what we already have on our statute books, but should be constructive and should clarify the present confused situation, and impose a tax program that will be equitable and just to all banking capital in the various States.

Mr. Speaker, the National Tax Association met in conference, and after careful deliberation and counsel suggested legislation that I believe was, in the main, reasonable and just, giving no special privilege or advantage to any capital employed in banking, but attempting to tax all capital employed in the banking business in the various States exactly alike, which, in my judgment, is the only correct basis of taxation in this case.

Much has been said in the debate here to-day about permitting private banking firms like J. P. Morgan & Co., Lee, Higginson & Co., and so forth, to escape their legitimate taxes. Of course, no one desires this condition. Every Member of Congress would be opposed to any such taxing condition. These big private bankers should be made to pay the same tax as any small bank or banker. No discrimination of this kind should be permitted under any law or system of taxation. But, Mr. Speaker, this discrimination, according to those who raised the point in debate, exists now even under section 5219. Hence some definite change, such as proposed by the National Tax Association, should be brought out in our legislation. We should do nothing to injure the national banks, nor should we do anything to place the State banks and trust companies in any disadvantage as compared to national banks. My contention is that all capital employed in the banking business should be taxed on the same basis.

Money and credit tax laws in some States and net income tax laws in other States, devised to tax the moneys and credits and incomes in the hands of the ordinary private individuals, are making satisfactory progress, and, no doubt, will be strengthened by experience and growth; but no one, I think, will contend to-day that this system would suffice as a taxing medium for capital employed in the banking business.

The pending bill, if enacted into law, would, as I have already stated, simply reiterate the present situation and would not give any relief whatsoever to the situation as it now exists in several of the States, notably New York, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin, but I think would tend to further confound and confuse the situation and tend to make national banks the favored banking class among the banks, or else so reduce the taxes on all banking capital as to make capital employed in banking especially favored in the payment of their just property taxes in their respective communities. Neither of these two conditions should be permitted to exist.

It is argued that banks now, in some communities, pay an unjust proportion of the tax compared with other taxable properties. I believe that this is true, but it is equally true that the taxing of banking capital as other moneys and credits in the hands of private individuals would be absolutely unfair to all other property taxpayers and would be especially favorable to banks. It is competing capital that should be made the measuring rod of equality as to taxation, and all banking capital, private, State, and national, should be assessed on the same basis.

I wish to state that I desire to be absolutely fair and square to all classes of banks. Banks should not be overtaxed. On the other hand, I can not see my way clear, as a representative of the rights of all the people, to vote for any legislation that I do not believe is going to be equally fair to all other interests and permit any possible escape of taxation by banks which they should rightfully pay in their respective communities. I for one do not believe that any State will long tax banks except on a fair basis as compared to all other property.

I favor the validating clause in the bill, but I question whether the validation as given in the bill is sufficient, and believe that it should be broadened as indicated in the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota]. I also believe this bill should be amended by inserting, after the word "tax," in line 9, page 2, the words "or as supplementary thereto," in order to help out the proper assessment of bank stock in States like Wisconsin, where the income tax law is not in lieu of, but supplementary to, the present property tax.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I believe that unless the chairman is willing to accept these amendments to the pending bill, I shall be compelled to move to recommit with instructions to add the following amendments to the bill:

Amend, on page 2, line 5, by striking out, after the word "capital," the remainder of said line, all of lines 6 and 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "employed in the business of banking," so that the said subdivision will read as follows:

"I. (a) That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital employed in the business of banking."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "tax," insert "or as supplementary thereto."

Amend subdivision 3, on page 3, line 1, after the word "thereof," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That such taxation is not greater than the taxation imposed for the same period upon banks, banking associations, or trust companies doing a banking business, incorporated by or under the laws of such State, or upon the moneyed capital or shares thereof," so that the section will read as follows: "That the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as heretofore in force shall not prevent the legalizing, ratifying, or confirming by the States of any tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed upon the shares of national banks, or the collecting thereof: Provided, That such taxation is not greater than the taxation imposed for the same period upon banks, banking associations, or trust companies doing a banking business, incorporated by or under the laws of such State, or upon the moneyed capital or shares thereof."

I wish to call to your attention a few observations suggested by the tax commission of my own State, which I think are pertinent to the bill and to this discussion.

The pending bill does not change materially the language of the present statute as interpreted by the Richmond decision, which means that no State can tax the shares of stock in a national bank at a higher rate than is imposed upon notes, stock, bonds, and similar securities in the hands of private individuals.

When we recall that there are 15 States in which a special and very much lower rate is prescribed for moneys and credits in the hands of private individuals than upon any other class of property, and when we further recall the fact that in three States, including my own State of Wisconsin, such moneys and credits are exempt from taxation altogether, it becomes very plain that by the terms of the bill proposed national banks will escape taxation on the shares of stock in three States altogether and be limited to a mere fraction of what all other property pays, except moneys and credits, in 15 other States. This situation is exactly what the tax commissioners of the several States wish to remedy, and it seems to me that the adoption of the pending bill really affords no relief for the present situation.

The provision of the bill which provides "That in any State where a tax in lieu of a property tax is assessed upon the net income derived from such other moneyed capital, such State may, in lieu of a tax on the shares, impose upon the bank an income tax assessed upon the net income of the bank, but such tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed on the net income of such other moneyed capital," is practically the only feature in the new bill which alters the present law in any material respect, and due reflection will show the inadequacy of this provision.

It will be noted that the authority to tax the net income of the bank conferred by this provision is not in addition to but in lieu of the taxation of the shares of stock. In other words, the States may tax either the shares of stock, as prescribed in the first subdivision of the bill, or the income of the bank, as prescribed in the second subdivision of the bill, but it can not tax both. If the income tax was intended to be or was in fact an equivalent for the property tax, there would really be some merit in this proposal. But it will be found that the income tax in some States is supplementary and additional to the property tax and not in lieu thereof.

I wish to give Wisconsin as an example. The highest amount of income taxes ever collected in this State was slightly less than $7,000,000, and the aggregate taxes for the entire State that year were $72,000,000. It is clear, therefore, that the income tax never yielded as much as 10 per cent of our total taxes, and the collections in Wisconsin for 1921 were only $4,681,000 out of an aggregate tax of $112,291,000, or less than 5 per cent of the total. It will be observed that, even if the provision of the Wisconsin law, which authorizes the offset of personal property taxes against income taxes, were repealed, the aggregate assessment of income taxes would not in normal years amount to 10 per cent of the total tax levy.

It is my information that substantially the same proportions between the yield of the income tax and property taxes obtain in the States of Massachusetts and New York.

If we should apply the income tax at the Wisconsin rates, which are the highest imposed by any State income tax in the country, to the income of banks, assuming 10 per cent net earnings on capital, surplus, and undivided profits, the maximum rate that could be imposed on a property basis would be 6 mills on the dollar, whereas, we are informed, the actual tax rates in the cities and villages of the State range from 2½ to 3½ per cent, averaging close to 3 per cent of the assessed valuation. It is clearly seen that this is from four to five times more than the maximum rate that could be applied to national banks under the proposed bill, assuming a 10 per cent profit. Of course, it is to be observed that if profits were larger than that the ratio would be reduced.

I wish to insert a table provided by the tax commission of the State of Wisconsin to visualize clearly just what the provision of the bill to put income tax in lieu of ordinary property tax would do:

	Assessed bank stock, 1921.	Tax rate.	Present tax.	Income tax on capital stock only.	Income tax on capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits.
Milwaukee (city)	$18,872,095	$0.0292	$551,065	$86,420	$149,276
Superior (city)	898,500	.02687	24,143	4,415	6,894
La Crosse (city)	1,831,461	.026	47,618	6,650	12,145
Grantsburg (village)	63,000	.0458	2,883	290	653

Permit me to say in closing that I desire to be absolutely equitable and just in our tax provisions, but I do not believe that banks should ask to be relieved of their just tax burdens in any community as compared to all other property. I believe the amendments which I have suggested would make this bill a better bill, just to all competing banks, be they private, State, or national, and also just to the other taxpayers in the community. Legislation is of little value that merely reiterates and reaffirms the present situation without offering some actual relief to the situation as it now exists, for which the tax commissioners of the majority of the States of the Union are pleading.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take any more time. I had promised some time to the gentleman from Minnesota, but he has been called out. Does the gentleman from Arkansas wish to use any more time?

Mr. WINGO. No; I am willing to vote now.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Does that shut out debate on amendments?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The Speaker having declared the vote, and a parliamentary inquiry intervening, does that result in an automatic roll call?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would, but the Chair is not certain he declared the vote.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair said the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] was on his feet. The Chair thinks that he would have a right to claim that the previous question had not been ordered; that he would have a right to demand a division. The recollection of the Chair would be that he did not say that the previous question had been ordered, but he may have. Very frequently the Chair states the result of the vote, and then a gentleman rises and the Chair never insists that the vote has been completed.

Mr. WALSH. Did not the gentleman rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry? He did not doubt the vote.

Mr. WINGO. It was obvious that the parliamentary inquiry was for the purpose of determining whether or not he would challenge the vote. I think the Speaker is right.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair to be fair play to the House to hold that the gentleman had a right to demand a division and a roll call on the question. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 201, nays 28, answered "present" 2, and not voting 199, as follows:

Mr. Michaelson with Mr. Hawes.

Mr. Frear with Mr. Goldsborough.

Mr. Davis of Minnesota with Mr. Rainey of Alabama.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I am in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. A. P. NELSON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendments:

Amend, on page 2, line 5, by striking out after the word "capital" the remainder of said line, all of lines 6 and 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "employed in the business of banking," so that the said subdivision will read as follows:

"I. (a) That the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital employed in the business of banking."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "tax," insert "or as supplementary thereto."

Amend subdivision 3 on page 3, line 1, after the word "thereof," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That such taxation is not greater than the taxation imposed for the same period upon banks, banking associations, or trust companies doing a banking business, incorporated by or under the laws of such State, or upon the moneyed capital or shares thereof," so that the section will read as follows: "That the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as heretofore in force shall not prevent the legalizing, ratifying, or confirming by the States of any tax heretofore paid, levied, or assessed upon the shares of national banks, or the collecting thereof: Provided, That such taxation is not greater than the taxation imposed for the same period upon banks, banking associations, or trust companies doing a banking business, incorporated by or under the laws of such State, or upon the moneyed capital or shares thereof."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not debate this at this time.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I want to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, at 12 o'clock two amendments which were embodied in the motion to recommit were submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] as chairman of the committee and also on the other side.

I was necessarily out of the Chamber for a moment when the motion was made for the previous question, and with no intimation that debate was to be shut off and opportunity to amend prevented by a motion for the previous question. I ask unanimous consent to make a five-minute statement with reference to the proposed motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, it will open up another question, and if the gentleman is going to make an ex parte statement on that I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] or some one who knows the legal effect of this should be heard.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WALSH. The order for the previous question shuts out debate, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not understand. If the previous question is voted down it is not to shut off debate. This would simply prevent further amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the previous question had been moved, would not my colleague be entitled to proceed for a time in debate?

The SPEAKER. No. The right to debate was ended when the House voted the previous question on the bill. Now, the only result of ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit is to prevent amendments by that motion. There will be no more debate.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON] to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Divison, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 96.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I object to the vote on that account.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 173, answered "present" 2, not voting 194, as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Additional general pairs:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.

Mr. Morin with Mr. Hardy of Texas.

Mr. Hutchinson with Mr. Ten Eyck.

Mr. Clark of New York with Mr. Lazaro.

Mr. Sinclair with Mr. Drane.

Mr. Vare with Mr. Logan.

Mr. Snyder with Mr. Rucker.

Mr. Cannon with Mr. Jacoway.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MCFADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Banking and Currency any further business?

Mr. MCFADDEN. It has not. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEARNS rose.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I will withhold it.

VIEWS OF MINORITY ON MUSCLE SHOALS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] is recognized.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the time for filing views of minority on the Muscle Shoals matter extended to next Tuesday at midnight.

Mr. MONDELL. Not to interfere with the consideration of the measure.

The SPEAKER. Not to interfere with the consideration of the measure. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the minority views have already been filed and printed.

Mr. MONDELL. There is another minority report.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes. Certain views have been reduced to writing and printed, but there are other views that have not been printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the remarks I made a few days ago regarding interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD his remarks made a few days ago regarding interstate commerce. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, some time ago a suit was brought by a national bank against the city of Richmond, Va., for the purpose of having the tax assessed against the stockholders of the bank declared void as being in violation of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section makes it illegal for a State to tax at a greater rate the shares of a national bank than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. It was established upon the trial that a tax rate of $1.75 for $100 was imposed upon the capital stock of the bank, while a rate of only 95 cents per $100 was imposed upon notes, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness, and that a part of such indebtedness was moneyed capital in the hands of individuals that came in competition with the bank in the loan market. Upon this showing the Supreme Court held that the tax against the shares of the bank was void. When this decision was announced State taxing officers throughout the country at once appealed to the Congress for an amendment to this section. The tax commissioners of different States met here in Washington and formulated suitable amendments. They appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House and strenuously urged relief from this decision, but they were as strenuously opposed by the national banks. Many suits have been instituted by national banks in different States to defeat the payment of all taxes imposed upon them by taking advantage of this ruling of the Supreme Court.

The bill prepared and urged by the committee grants no relief whatever to the States from the doctrine announced in this case. It may be assumed that the argument advanced in support of this bill embodies the reasons which have swayed the committee. Briefly they are: First, that the Richmond case announces no new doctrine; second, that the case was lost by the city of Richmond because it was not properly tried; and, third, that the States ought to change their laws so as to conform to this rule for the reason that the national banks are instrumentalities of the National Government and should not be subjected to the competition forbidden by this section. These reasons—if they can be called reasons—do not appeal to me and do not satisfy the States in their demand for an amendment to this section. It is clearly immaterial whether the doctrine announced is old or new, and it is of even less consequence whether the Richmond case was properly tried or not. The question for the House to decide is whether we can defend application of the doctrine announced in that case to modern conditions.

This statute seeks to prevent States from discriminating against national banks and in favor of State banks, private or corporate, competing with national banks. No one can fairly object to a statute that prevents a State from taxing the shares of a national bank higher than it taxes the shares of a State bank doing substantially the same kind of business. But this statute goes a great deal further. It does not only prohibit a State from taxing the stock of a national bank higher than it taxes the stock of a State bank, but it prohibits a State from taxing a promissory note taken upon a private loan at a less rate than it taxes the stock of a national bank. At the time that this statute was passed I presume it worked no great hardship upon the States, for the reason that in the States credits were then taxed the same as bank stock and at the same rate. Since then a more enlightened policy has been adopted by many States. Instead of taxing such credits as other personal property a number of States do not tax credits at all, and other States impose only a nominal or very low rate, much lower than that imposed on other property. A tax imposed upon credits is a burden upon business conducted on credit, and as a tax on credits is nearly always shifted by the creditor to the debtor it is a tax upon a class of persons least able to pay it.

Not only does the decision in the Richmond case plainly announce that if a person loans, collects, and reloans his own money the note or bond he takes for that loan must under the State law be taxed at as high a rate as that imposed upon the stock of a national bank, but in other cases the Supreme Court has held, and it is the recognized law, that if a State allows a creditor to deduct his debts from his credits, every owner of stock in a national bank in that State must be permitted to deduct his debts from the assessed value of such stock. This is the acme of absurdity.

Instead of preventing States from discriminating against national banks this statute discriminates in an utterly indefensible fashion in favor of national banks. To insist that a promissory note must be taxed at the same rate as a share in a national bank can not be defended. Bank stock represents a share in a going business that has a franchise and a good will of great value, neither of which receives any substantial consideration in estimating the value of bank stock for taxation purposes. That value is usually assessed upon the book value of its assets. A bank earns nearly all of its dividends not on its own money, but upon the money of its depositors, still it pays no tax upon such deposits. (Bank of Redemption v. Boston, 125 U. S. 60.)

No one has and no one can point out any good reason why the State should not be permitted to tax the shares of such a business at a higher rate than it taxes the note of a private investor who loans his own money. The specious plea that national banks are instrumentalities of the National Government and for that reason must not be subjected to the kind of competition that this statute prohibits can deceive no one. The national banks can not justify any such favoritism upon any such pretense. The governmental functions with which these banks are invested are only incidental to the ordinary business of banking, and are as a rule privileges rather than obligations, privileges from which these banks derive substantial advantage and profit.

There is no reason, and no ingenuity has been able to suggest one, why national banks should not be subject to the same rate of taxation as State banks. There is no reason why the States should be put in a strait-jacket to prevent them from dealing with this subject in a fair and just way. Those who favor this legislation are trifling with a tornado that is likely to wipe them off the face of the earth.

Since the Richmond case was decided this matter has become acute, and unless the Supreme Court comes to the rescue—and it can not do so without legislating—some of my friends will have to do a lot of apologizing. To tell the States to depend upon the ingenuity of lawyers to defeat the plain language of the statute as construed by the Supreme Court is offering a stone in place of bread.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 15, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

644. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, with a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, an estimate of appropriation for the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, amounting to $4,593.74 (H. Doc. No. 348); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

645. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, with a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, in the amount of $110,000 (H. Doc. No. 349); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WALSH: Committee on the Judiciary. S. 3156. An act to amend section 70 of the Judicial Code to change the terms of the District Court for the Northern Division of the Southern District of Alabama; with amendments (Rept. No. 1098). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DALLINGER: Committee on Elections No. 1. House Report No. 1101. A report on the contested-election case of Paul v. Harrison. Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LANHAM: Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. H. R. 11298. A bill amending existing law which authorizes the construction of a public building at Paris, Tex., so as to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a new site for same by exchanging therefor land and property now owned by the United States Government in said city; and to authorize the erection on said new site, when acquired, a public building suitable for post-office purposes, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1099). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNER: Committee on Insular Affairs. H. R. 9270. A bill to confer upon the territorial courts of Porto Rico concurrent jurisdiction with the United States courts of that district of all offenses under the national prohibition act, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto; without amendment (Rept. No. 1102). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. KNUTSON: Committee on Pensions. H. R. 12019. A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; without amendment (Rept. No. 1097). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Committee on Military Affairs. H. R. 6204. A bill to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla., and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes; with an amendment (Rept. No. 1100). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 12019) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. ELLIS: A bill (H. R. 12020) to define a period in which certain claims may be presented for determination to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for refund of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates of decedents under color of section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," and amendments; and to authorize payment of amounts allowed in the determination of such claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 12021) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CABLE: A bill (H. R. 12022) relative to the naturalization and citizenship of married women; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the tariff bill will be temporarily laid aside, and the Chair lays before the Senate the naval appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gooding	McKinley	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	McNary	Shortridge
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Simmons
Calder	Hitchcock	Newberry	Smoot
Cameron	Johnson	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Overman	Underwood
Dial	Kendrick	Pepper	Wadsworth
Edge	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Elkins	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	Lenroot	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene	Willis
Gerry	McCormick	Rawson

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent by reason of illness.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in connection with the naval appropriation bill which has just been laid before the Senate there was a report submitted. The report was printed some days ago and sets out the most important changes recommended by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in the bill as it passed the House. I do not care to take the time of the Senate in making a speech upon the bill or any feature of it at this time. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed first to the consideration of the committee amendments. When they are disposed of the bill will then be subject to any amendments that may be proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. Does that mean that there is to be no reading of the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not mention whether there should be a reading of the bill or not, but unless there is some reason for reading the bill at length, I would much prefer to dispense with its formal reading. I shall be very glad, indeed, to stop at any point in the bill which any Senator desires to have specially considered and take such time as may be necessary for the reading of any provision as to which that may be required.

Mr. KING. I shall not insist upon the formal reading of the bill, with the understanding that we may pause as the reading progresses, and such explanations may be asked for and given as Senators may desire.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is the desire of the committee to have the fullest consideration of any disputed feature of the bill. I shall be very glad to cooperate with the Senator from Utah to that effect.

Mr. President, there are just one or two remarks I would like to make in regard to the bill in explanation of the general status of the matters covered by it. Senators will remember that there was quite a discussion, more or less prolonged, upon the question of personnel. The House committee reported the bill to the House of Representatives providing for a personnel of 67,000 enlisted men, of which 2,000 were to be apprentices. After a very extended debate in the House of Representatives that number was increased by action of the House to 86,000 enlisted men.

While there were some members of the committee who regretted that a larger personnel was not provided for, in view of all the conditions surrounding the Navy at this time, it was decided not to recommend any change in the provisions of the bill as to personnel as it passed the House of Representatives, and the bill contains no changes in that respect.

However, since the bill passed the House of Representatives Congress has enacted a law making some changes in the pay both of the enlisted and commissioned personnel of the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, all the commissioned services of the Government. That has become a law, having been approved by the President. Of course whatever force we retain in the Navy will have to be paid in accordance with the provisions of that law.

I emphasize again, to those who have not had occasion to follow the matter, that that law has been enacted since the Navy appropriation bill passed the House of Representatives. Consequently it became necessary to readjust the amount of the appropriation carried in the bill for pay of the Navy, and also for provisions of the Navy to some extent, to make it correspond with the basis provided in the law to which I have just referred. That constitutes a total of approximately $20,000,000 net increase in the appropriations carried in the bill and the chief item of increase in the appropriations, about which of course I can not see that there can be any dispute after there is an agreement as to the personnel, because it is a matter of law.

We have added an appropriation of $10,000,000 for carrying on the work which is now in process upon the new ships of the Navy which have been under construction for several years. They include 4 battleships, 10 scout cruisers, 42 submarines, a few destroyers, and some auxiliary vessels. These are the ships left in the complement of the United States Navy under the terms of the recent naval limitation treaty entered into between the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy.

The committee believed it to be demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt that it was in the interest of economy, as long as we are to complete the program as to certain of the ships to which I have referred, to carry on the work steadily rather than to close down the plants and allowing the organization to be separated and then having to start up again. Such a course as that would be extravagant; and it would be an inefficient manner of proceeding. So we believe that the comparatively moderate increase of $10,000,000 on account of what is technically called an increase of the Navy—that is, to carry on work upon ships under construction—is in the interest of economy.

There is one other increase that is made in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator has alluded to an increase of $10,000,000 which is carried in the bill for naval construction. May I inquire whether that is for the construction of submarines, airplane carriers, or capital ships other than airplane carriers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It includes all the purposes which the Senator from Utah has mentioned.

Mr. KING. Is any other part of the appropriation of several hundred million dollars to be devoted to the completion of vessels which are now upon the ways or for the construction or repair of vessels?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator mean for the construction and repair of vessels that are already in commission?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; there is another appropriation in the bill for the construction and repair of vessels that are already in commission.

Mr. KING. Then the appropriation for $10,000,000 is for new construction solely?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is for the construction of new ships; it is called "for the increase of the Navy."

Mr. KING. Take, for instance, the West Virginia, which, I presume, will be retained; will that be completed out of this appropriation of $10,000,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Work will be carried on upon the West Virginia from a fund provided in the bill, some of which was carried in the bill as it passed the House, and which will include the $10,000,000 if that sum is added to it. Work will be carried on upon the West Virginia and upon the other ships to which the Senator from Utah has referred from that fund.

Mr. KING. May I inquire, though perhaps the inquiry is not quite germane to the point to which I am now directing attention, whether the appropriation carried in the last naval appropriation bill has been exhausted?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it has not, and that is the reason that only the sum of $10,000,000 is appropriated in this bill. There was no new appropriation whatever in the bill as it passed the other House for new construction, but simply a reappropriation of the unexpended balance of the fund to which the Senator from Utah refers.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that the last naval appropriation bill carried ninety-odd million dollars for construction. How much of that will be available on the 1st of July next?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The sum of $44,385,000 will then be available.

Mr. KING. Then about 50 per cent of last year's appropriations will have been expended on the 1st of July?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KING. What becomes of the $44,000,000 which has not been expended?

Mr. POINDEXTER. A reply to the Senator's question would involve quite an extended detailed statement. The Senator will find printed in the concluding pages of the report of the Senate Appropriations Committee on the pending bill a statement showing just how much of the unexpended balance will be expended upon each ship and upon each class of ships. It will be used upon 42 submarines, 3 battleships, 10 scout cruisers, and 2 airplane carriers to be converted from battle cruisers which were to be eliminated or converted in accordance with the terms of the arms limitation treaty.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Washington refers to that part of the report on the pending bill which is found on pages 7, 8, and 9?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. President, there is one other item that I may mention, and then I think there will be set clearly before the Senate the important recommendations of the committee reporting this bill.

The committee recommends an appropriation of $6,500,000 for new aircraft. There was nothing carried in the bill as it passed the other House for new aircraft. However, in the report of the House committee to the House it was stated that, in the opinion of that committee, some $7,000,000 would be required for the construction of new aircraft, and some $500,000 for the construction of hangars and other appurtenances at aircraft stations; but the House made no appropriations for those purposes. In view of the conceded importance of the Air Service in naval warfare, as shown by the experience of other nations and by demonstrations and tests that have been carried on in this country, the committee regarded it as of vital importance that the United States should not altogether stop the construction of aircraft and the maintenance of an Air Service in the Navy. Consequently we have added an appropriation of $6,500,000 for new aircraft and $300,000 for construction at stations, which means the construction of buildings which are necessary to the maintenance, operation, and repair of the new aircraft to be constructed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I was informed on yesterday that under this bill an effort was made to eliminate from the Air Service, I think, 50 commissioned officers. Is that correct?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator refer to the bill as it passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I refer to the bill as it is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bill as reported by the Senate committee has just the opposite effect of that, as compared with the bill as it came to the Senate from the House. Instead of eliminating 50 temporary officers in the Aviation Service, it provides for retaining in the service that number of commissioned officers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, possibly I may have misunderstood my informant. Do I understand now from what the Senator has said that the House bill would have relieved 50 of those officers from duty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The House bill would have relieved from duty a great many more than that, or, more correctly speaking, would not have prevented their separation from the service, because they would have been separated from the service under existing law unless some new provision was made for them.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask the Senator further, so that my understanding may be clear about this question, if I am justified in inferring from what the Senator has said that under the pending bill the Air Service connected with the Navy Department will continue as it now is?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; not strictly speaking; but it will continue as it now is, with the exception that under the existing law some of the temporary aviation officers will be separated from the service by limitation of time on the 1st of July. That is what the law now provides entirely separate and apart from this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. How many of them?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In the neighborhood of 83.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps I can enlighten the Senator from Ohio, because, as the Senator from Washington will recall, I had something to do with the hearings before the subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee on this subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to complete the statement I was making, in order that the Senator from Ohio, if I may make myself clear, may get a correct idea of the matter?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In the neighborhood of 83 aviation officers failed in the examinations which were given them some time ago, and, having failed, they would be separated from the service by the expiration of time and the limitations of existing law on the 1st of July. We recommend in this bill that an opportunity be given to not exceeding 50 of those officers to be reexamined.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask for a reference to the page of the bill which contains that provision to which the Senator has alluded?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is on page 35.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is at the bottom of page 35 of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask a question in regard to the procedure here?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the formal reading of the bill has been dispensed with and that it is to be read for committee amendments?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that we are to proceed to take up the committee amendments as they are reached in the reading of the bill. In the colloquy on the floor, while there was no formal agreement on the subject, it was tentatively understood that the reading of the entire bill was dispensed with, unless some Senator should ask that some portion of it in which he was interested be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington to request unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to that procedure, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, at a later time I will explain in detail the situation in connection with the aviation service of the Navy as to which the Senator from Ohio has asked. I understand, however, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] desires to take the floor, and I will not take the time to discuss the matter at present. I yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interfere with the naval appropriation bill which is now before the Senate, but I gave notice on yesterday evening that, while I could not then speak because of the lateness of the hour, I desired at the first opportunity to make some remarks in reply to the very remarkable speech delivered on yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with reference to the tariff bill.

The Senator from North Dakota delivered a speech yesterday which divides itself naturally and logically into two parts: First, an explanation, or an attempted explanation, of the criticisms and assaults upon his bill by the Republican press, especially the great metropolitan Republican newspapers; and, secondly, an argument in favor of his bill based upon the spread between the invoice or landing cost of the foreign article and the retail selling price of that article in the American market. I think an examination of the bill will show that such was its objective, and that as an explanation on the one hand of the newspaper opposition to his bill, and an argument on the other hand in favor of the rates in the bill, the Senator's effort was wholly inadequate and must have been a dismal disappointment to those who sympathized with his purposes.

Mr. President, I wish as briefly as I possibly can to analyze the Senator's several contentions; and first let me direct my attention to his defense of his bill from the assaults that have been made upon it by the newpapers and the general public. It is well known that heretofore, in the discussion of tariff measures, very little attention has been paid to the specific schedules in the bill. The discussions have centered around the fundamental differences with respect to the tariff principles of the two great political parties, the difference between what the Republicans termed low tariff or free trade, as advocated by the Democrats, and high tariff or protection, as advocated by the Republican Party.

I have had to do with many tariff bills, and I have discovered how little light such general discussions have thrown upon these measures that are of such vital importance to the people. I therefore determined, Mr. President, as the minority member of the committee responsible for the management of this bill upon the floor of the Senate, that I would see to it that this bill had a thorough discussion, not only of a general character, not only of an academic character, but a discussion in detail of the paragraphs and the items and the schedules, to the end that the press of the country and the people of the United States might be advised as to the extent of the taxes imposed and the reasons of their imposition, that they might intelligently pass judgment upon whether the circumstances and facts of the particular case justified the tax. So for the first time in the history of tariff making in this country we began a detailed discussion of every item as it was reached, presenting the facts and the figures touching the particular article taxed, and exposing the injustice of the tax in case the facts did not in our opinion warrant the duty imposed.

When we first began that discussion, the other side of the Chamber refused to respond, and let it be understood that having the votes to pass this measure they did not care to participate in the discussion of the items. It was with difficulty that we secured from them responses to inquiries for information, but we were not disheartened. We pressed on with the discussion, we made exposure after exposure, and as a result in a short time we began to reach the public with our facts and arguments against these rates. Then we began to reach the press of the country. As never before, the public began to discuss these tariff rates, while certain great metropolitan papers that had always stood for protection, that had always been orthodox in their Republicanism, began to take interest in these daily discussions and to investigate these rates. They soon saw that the bill was not a protective measure at all, that its rates did not square with any principle of protection that had ever been advocated in this country by the champions of protection or that had ever been declared by Republican conventions as the basis of rates. They began to see that instead of being a tariff for protection it was a tariff to maintain existing exorbitant profits and prices of the products of the protected industries; that it was not only a tariff for the purpose of maintaining those profits but it was a tariff which afforded an opportunity further to advance those profits to the point of further profiteering without danger of competition from abroad. As a result, Mr. President, a great metropolitan paper of the Middle West, always stanch in its Republicanism and adherance to the theory of a protective tariff, unable to square this bill with that theory and with the welfare of the American people, came out in a great editorial denouncing the measure. I refer to the Chicago Tribune, a paper of as large circulation, as I understand, as any paper in the Middle West. The Chicago Tribune declared the bill to be iniquitous; it declared that it ought never to pass in the form in which it was then presented. That was followed by a great editorial in the New York Journal of Commerce, another great Republican paper, upon the same lines, making substantially the same arguments that we had been making here upon the floor of the Senate against these items, one after another.

Mr. President, I took occasion to read these editorials into the RECORD and to comment upon them, and at the same time to express the hope that other great newspapers in this country, irrespective of party, would follow these discussions and make independent investigations of these rates, and discharge their duty to the public by exposing this bill and these rates if in their judgment, after these investigations, they thought it proper to do so. As a result, other papers—I shall not recount them now, but later I shall refer to them again—other great newspapers in this country representing the Republican Party, and Democratic and independent papers as well, not only in the great metropolis of the country but in the smaller towns of the country, speaking as Republican organs, speaking as independent organs, speaking as nonpartisan and as commercial papers, came out in denunciation of the measure; whereupon the chairman of the Finance Committee, becoming alarmed at the effect of these assaults upon his bill, felt the necessity of making some answer, felt the necessity of making some explanation, in the hope of breaking the force of this volume of opposition and protest from the press which was meeting a ready response from the people of the United States, including many lifelong and stanch Republicans and protectionists.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to allow me to interrupt him to cite the fact that at least one important commercial body, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Lincoln, Nebr., a Republican stronghold, formally met, and the retail section of that chamber of commerce adopted resolutions protesting against the passage of the bill, and those resolutions were formally transmitted to the Senators and Representatives from Nebraska by the Chamber of Commerce of Lincoln, a city which is overwhelmingly a Republican center. I have been informed that other representative bodies of that sort, representing the business interests of the community, have held similar meetings of protest.

Mr. SIMMONS. I recall that the Senator did present the resolutions to which he refers, adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Lincoln, Nebr.

The Senator from North Dakota, in charge of this bill, under the impulsion of necessity, from his standpoint, took occasion to make a violent assault upon the Republican newspapers from which I had read. He charged that they were influenced to make their attacks upon his bill because of the advertising patronage which they receive from the department stores and the importers, of course charging, by that, that the commercial opponents of this bill were confined to the department stores and the importers. He attempted to account for their opposition upon the ground that these great journals were moved in their opposition by the advertising subsidy they were charged with receiving from those sources. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] asked the Senator from North Dakota if he meant to say that these importers and these department stores could have purchased the support of these great newspapers with cash, and he declined to answer, but let his charge stand.

When the Senator in his first speech attempted in this way to account for the assaults of the two papers—the only ones I had quoted at the time of his defense—I countered by quoting not one or two but a half dozen or more additional papers, some of them Republican and some of them independent papers. A few days thereafter I supplemented that list by presenting to the Senate articles from nearly a score of papers published in different parts of the country, some of them farm papers, some of them commercial papers, some of them nonpartisan papers, one of them, I think, a religious paper, and others independent papers, and to this good day he has persisted in the contention that the motive he assigned accounted for this opposition to his bill on the part of these great newspapers.

Yesterday he repeated his former charge and devoted much of his speech to renewed denunciation of these papers and these alleged sinister influences charged with influencing their action in this behalf.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will not interrupt the Senator, if he objects, but I have before me an editorial from the Ohio State Journal, a Republican paper, of June 3, 1922, bearing upon this subject. I will not introduce it now, unless the Senator desires me to present it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will not the Senator from Ohio let me set him right? He will remember that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] read that paper out of the Republican Party the other day.

Mr. POMERENE. I know it has been independent at times, but the editor and publisher of the paper contributed liberally to the Republican campaign fund in Ohio in 1920.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the New York papers, such as the Journal of Commerce, the Globe, the Daily News Record of New York, the New York Tribune, and the New York Herald, five great Republican papers in that city, five of the leading papers of the greatest metropolis on earth, can be influenced to oppose a measure of this kind, promulgated by the party in charge of the Government, a measure claimed to be in the interest of general prosperity; if they can be purchased by the advertising of two relatively small classes of interests, then indeed has the press of America sunk to a low level; then indeed are the vital interests of the American people, whose palladium of liberty and freedom is largely an untrammeled and an honest press, in jeopardy.

These are all great papers. They are supposed to be highly prosperous and to be backed by adequate finances. They are published in the metropolis of the world, so to speak, where the press is supposed to be free from the local and partisan influences which may obtain in small communities. The country at large is in the habit of looking to the great metropolitan press for a fair, honest, impartial expression of opinion with reference to public questions, and yet the chairman of the Finance Committee would have the country believe that five of the great Republican papers of the metropolis of the country can be purchased, their columns and their editorials, with advertisements.

When it was shown, as it has been shown, that the opposition is not confined to the press of the metropolis or to the great importing centers, but is widely distributed, the Senator persists in the charge that the baneful influence of the department stores and the importer upon the newspapers of the country, perverting the channels of information upon which the people are wont to rely for aid to solve the great public questions which confront them, accounts for the opposition to this bill, which has assumed threatening proportions in the ranks of his own party.

Mr. President, I can not conceive of anything more farfetched than that. Even if the opposition were confined to the newspapers published in the immediate vicinity of the importing metropolis, or in the immediate vicinity of the department stores, I can not understand the argument, and I can not understand why the chairman of the Finance Committee should be willing to present to the American people such an argument as that in explanation of these assaults upon the bill. It seems not only inadequate but, if I may say it without discourtesy, trifling and frivolous.

Mr. President, are the importers the chief advertisers of the country? Indeed, are they large newspaper advertisers at all? If we take up the great newspapers of New York or of Chicago or of Philadelphia or of Baltimore, I venture the assertion that we will find in them very little advertising by the importers. The great advertisers are not the importers. The great advertisers are the men who make the special articles, the great industrial combinations and corporations, many of which have received such specially favorable consideration and treatment in the bill. They are the greatest newspaper advertisers. Many of them are in favor of the bill and want it passed.

But is it conceivable that these great newspapers with these two classes of advertisers, one the importer doing a small amount of advertising as compared with the other doing a large amount of advertising, in order to serve the smaller advertising patron would deliberately antagonize the larger and more profitable one?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rather deplore the apparent admission of the Senator from North Carolina that it would be possible under any circumstances for any set of advertisers to control the papers of New York or any other city.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, Mr. President, nothing could be further from my thought than admitting it. I said "if" it could be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from North Carolina would be justified in condemning the arguments of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] as childish and provincial and entirely out of date. If there is one thing fairly established in the newspaper world to-day it is that advertising is placed upon the strictest business principle. There is not an advertiser of any importance who does not buy his publicity at the cheapest price at which he can get it. There is not one of them who spends a dollar if he can avoid spending it. Of the millions of dollars invested every year in advertising in the newspapers of New York City, practically every dollar is put into the newspaper advertising upon the most cold-blooded business principle. There is not an advertiser who goes into a paper by reason of favor and I doubt whether one one-hundredth part of 1 per cent of the advertising in New York City is a matter of favor.

Merchants do their advertising because they have to reach the public. They buy their advertising space as they buy the goods they sell, upon the lowest possible market and to get the greatest amount of publicity for the least amount of money. Any paper in New York, probably every paper in New York, rejects thousands of dollars of advertising a year and declines to accept it. I repeat, the money of the advertiser that goes into the newspapers nowadays goes in because the merchant is compelled to do it to get publicity, and the day has gone when advertising is placed by favor.

I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that during the last generation advertising has developed into a science. The great merchants of New York employ men at high salaries to find how they can get the largest amount of advertising, the largest amount of publicity, for the least amount of money, and they figure down to the very one-hundredth part of a cent how much an inch of space costs per thousand of circulation, and they buy that inch. They buy it not because they want to favor the paper, but because they must have the publicity to run their business. So this talk about advertising being placed by favor is not only an unjustified charge against the New York newspapers and against the newspapers of any city, but it is an idiotic charge, Mr. President.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question about newspapers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No man would make such a statement who understood anything about advertising in this day and age.

Mr. BURSUM. Does the Senator from Nebraska believe that the newspapers of the metropolitan cities, such as New York, are more patriotic than the newspapers of the State of Michigan?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; no more than the people of New York are more patriotic than the people of the State of Michigan.

Mr. BURSUM. Then, how does the Senator from Nebraska reconcile the attitude on his side of the Chamber——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to yield for a political argument.

Mr. BURSUM. When the charge was made on the floor of the Senate that by reason of extensive advertising by Mr. NEWBERRY in the neswpapers of the State of Michigan the press was controlled and influenced.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have never made such a charge.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will not yield further for this political argument.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will permit the Senator from Nebraska to conclude his statement, but I decline to yield for a political argument.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not want to detract at all from what the Senator from North Carolina has said. He is absolutely correct in condemning the ridiculous charge made by the Senator from North Dakota. All I wanted to say is that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has betrayed his absolute ignorance of modern business methods when he argues that advertisement is placed by favor. A merchant would be an idiot to advertise by favor. What he is doing is to advertise for business, and he is placing his advertising where he can get the most publicity and circulation for the least possible money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what I tried to say and what I think I did say in substance was that the special articles which are put upon the market by the protected industries of the country and which find a ready and universal sale by reason of general advertisement are not advertised by the retailer, but by the producer. I might illustrate that by the American Tobacco Co. and the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co. The retailers who sell their products do not do the advertising of those products. The producers and manufacturers advertise throughout the country, making the brands popular, and thereby stimulating business and the demand for their products in the different localities of the country.

They and not the importers are the great advertisers. If the newspapers had to choose between the small advertiser and the large advertiser, they would undoubtedly not choose so as to offend the large patron in the interest of the smaller patron, was the statement I made, and, of course, that is true.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota thinks that the opposition to the bill not attributable to the influence of the importers over the newspapers is due to the influence of the advertising patronage of the great department stores. He violently assaults these stores. He referrend to them, as I recall it, as octopuses working much havoc and wreckage to the business welfare. Finally, as I recall it, in the heat of argument he compared them to the trusts. He puts the department stores in the same evil category as the trusts.

Mr. President, the trusts of the country are outlawed because they tend to stifle competition and arbitrarily establish prices. They are the subject of animadversion for that reason. But the department stores, which the Senator from North Dakota so bitterly denounced, do not suppress competition. On the contrary they are one of the greatest agencies in the country in the regulation of competition to the end of keeping down prices. They are popular with the people and almost continuously are putting on reduced price sales at which they must sell on small profit margins and which encourage and promote competition. Their prices and profits, while, of course, large in some instances, are relatively small. The reduced prices of the department stores, news of which is carried over the country in their advertisements, have their effect, too, upon the prices in stores in the smaller cities and towns. In the cities the competition among the department stores themselves is generally real and very sharp.

Department stores, therefore, instead of operating against the interest of the consumers of this country, operate in their interest through the regulation of prices. I will admit that during the World War the department stores, together with everybody else, went wild upon the subject of high prices, and that to a certain extent prices are still far too high; but I submit that the general influence of the department stores has not been against the public welfare; has not added to the burdens of the consumer but has been a restraining influence upon unbridled profiteering.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota proceeded throughout his argument upon the theory that the department stores were practically the only importers. Nothing could be further from the mark than that. He claimed that they were the chief beneficiaries of the high retail prices which the Senator called to the attention of the Senate on yesterday and denounced. As a matter of fact, the department stores are not large importers and their prices are lower than the average retailer. Some of them are not importers at all. A representative of Marshall Field & Co. came to my office a few days ago and discussed this subject with me, and he made the statement—and I believe it is true—that 90 per cent of the goods and wares carried in the department stores which are controlled and owned by Marshall Field & Co. are produced in the United States and that this was the average percentage. He stated that 10 per cent of their goods were of foreign origin, but that a larger part of that 10 per cent was composed of articles which were not produced in this country at all, and that the greater portion of the remainder consisted of foreign novelties and fancy designs which the trade demanded. I imagine this is true of many, if not of most, of the department stores.

It is necessary for these great establishments to keep a full line of goods. Unlike the ordinary big stores, their line of goods has to include everything, for they advertise to the people that they sell practically every article of merchandise sold in the American market. If an article is not produced in this country, they must go abroad and get it. If it is produced in this country, but not according to the design that is most attractive and popular to the consumer, they must go abroad for it.

The department stores, I repeat, are not great importers.

Who are our greatest importers? They are our great manufacturing industries. Many of them are large importers of raw materials; some import practically all their raw materials. If Senators will take the statistics and examine them, they will find that the bulk of our imports are materials which are for use in manufacturing. For instance, take silk. We are one of the greatest silk-manufacturing countries in the world; yet we do not produce raw silk. Practically every pound of raw silk converted in this country—and we manufacture sufficient to supply our domestic demand, which is very great—comes from the Orient. I might go on down the line and further demonstrate the fact that the department stores are relatively small importers.

The Senator from North Dakota in his assault upon the department stores has no basis or justification in fact; he predicated his assault upon a fictitious situation. The importers are not more interested in the defeat of this bill than the average business which is not a special beneficiary of its gratuities. I think, as the Senator from Nebraska has stated, it is absolutely silly to assign such reasons as those which I have discussed as the cause of the general uprising of the newspapers against the pending measure. Mr. President, this uprising is not confined to the newspapers. The Senator from North Dakota seems to think that it is confined to the newspapers. It extends to the people, irrespective of party. Why, bless my soul, it is not partisan but, indeed, bipartisan, so to speak.

It is only necessary to mix with Republicans to ascertain how obnoxious this measure is to many of them, how they regard it as violative of every principle of protection for which their party has heretofore stood. The Senator from North Dakota has offered no sufficient or even plausible reason for this Republican opposition to his bill, and the answer he makes as to the newspapers' opposition is vain and futile.

The Senator does not like the editorials criticizing and condemning his bill I have from time to time read to the Senate; but at the risk of further offending I wish to now read a few more, and I now ask to put in the RECORD certain additional editorials bearing out my statement as to the general uprising against this bill and to further enlighten the Senator from North Dakota with reference to the widespread character of this hostility. First, I will read an editorial from the Chicago Daily News—not the Chicago Tribune, a Republican paper which the Senator thinks was subsidized by advertisements, but the Chicago Daily News—an independent newspaper, which speaks as follows:

> Protectionist newspapers, stanchly Republican in politics, are almost daily directing attention to the excessive and extortionate duties in the pending bill. General business sentiment is hostile to it—

General business sentiment, Mr. President; the Senator from North Dakota thinks that nobody is hostile to it except the newspapers which have been bribed (?) by advertising patronage, but the Chicago Daily News, published in the great Middle West, says:

> General business sentiment is hostile to it and hopes it will not be passed. In such circumstances the suggestion of cloture—

This editorial is dated May 27—

> the suggestion of cloture is stupid and untimely.

Listen, Mr. President—

> More light on the jokers and anachronisms of the bill is urgently needed.

We have given light day after day, but the opposition has been trying to becloud and smother that light.

> Thus far its opponents have rendered the public valuable service. They are to be commended for their patient studies of obscure—

And listen again, Mr. President—> of obscure and tricky provisions that unpleasantly suggest the notorious Schedule K of the Aldrich tariff.

Mr. BORAH. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am reading from the Chicago Daily News, an independent newspaper, denouncing this measure, declaring that the general business sentiment of the country is hostile to it, declaring that it is full of "jokers" and anachronisms, that it ought not to pass, and that the Democrats and the other opponents of the bill have rendered the public a service in exposing it, especially its obscure and tricky provisions.

Now, I want to read another article from the New York Tribune. This article was written after the Senator from North Dakota had denounced the Chicago Tribune and the New York Journal of Commerce for "selling out" to the department stores and the importers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Chicago Daily News will serve very well to illustrate the point made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] a few minutes ago. That paper is not required to accommodate its editorial policy to the desires of any class of advertisers. I have no doubt the fact is, as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, that its patronage from domestic producers is very much larger than its patronage from either the department stores or the importers; but it is not obliged to accommodate its editorial policy to the desires of any class of advertisers. It is one of the great, profitable newspaper enterprises of the country, and it is not obliged to court any kind of advertising. It is always overwhelmed with applications for space in its columns.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think these other great newspapers are obliged to court advertising, either. They are highly prosperous and are able to be independent.

Now I want to read from the New York Tribune. Mr. President, is there any paper published in the United States whose Republicanism is less subject to criticism or question than that of the New York Tribune? Down in my country it has always been regarded as the very impersonation of extreme Republicanism and extreme protectionism, though it is a very great paper, one of long life and one of great prosperity. I do not believe that the New York Tribune could be bought by the advertisements that a department store would give or by the little advertisements that it could get from the importers of New York. In fact, I think the Senator from North Dakota would search that paper in vain to find an importer's advertisement. I imagine that they are not doing much advertising now. I do not think they ever have done much advertising. I never have seen much importers' advertising matter in the papers.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? A man who is making that much profit does not need to advertise?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true, if he makes as much as the Senator from North Dakota contends.

Mr. CARAWAY. But I was going to suggest that the Senator from North Dakota picks out the Tribune and accuses it of willfully misrepresenting the facts about shoes and says that when it was set right it would not publish the correction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; well, I am going to read what this paper says, anyhow, Mr. President:

> A tariff bill is not the sort of bill which should be railroaded through Congress. It affects a vast variety of individuals and group interests. It touches nearly every citizen. The more open and exhaustive the discussion on it the better—if the discussion is honest. Not even Mr. MCCUMBER claims that the Senate measure is error proof or that it should be taken as anything but a guess at what the country needs in the way of protection.
> A tariff bill at this session would be a gift of little value to the party or the country. A steam-rollered bill would be a challenge to party discontent and public indignation. (New York Tribune (Rep.), May 29, 1922.)

Mr. President, I want to read now an editorial from a paper published in Akron, Ohio. I do not know whether there are any great department stores in Akron, and I do not know anything about this newspaper. It is the Akron Times. I am told that it is an independent paper. I assume that it is honestly edited and that it is above bribery through advertising. If the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who sits before me, can throw any light upon it before I read, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. POMERENE. It is a very high-class paper.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota would have difficulty in showing that there was any immediate connection between this paper and the department stores or the importers.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator for a question, but I am not going to enter into any argument or controversy.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply want to ask a question of my colleague, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me. I want to ask my colleague whether he indorses the view expressed by the Senator from North Carolina that the Akron Times is an independent paper.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not answer that question. I think it is a Democratic paper.

Mr. WILLIS. That is my understanding. It is a high-class Democratic paper.

Mr. POMERENE. It is a very high-class paper. I think Democrats and Republicans alike concede that.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was given to me as an independent paper, and I will read what it says, for both Ohio Senators admit it is a high-class paper:

> Demands from the majority Senators that debate upon the McCumber tariff bill be squashed after but four weeks' consideration must appear somewhat arbitrary, in view of the fact that the majority Members have been over three years producing the bill and that the bulky tome already has more than 2,000 separate amendments.
> From the mere standpoint of party strategy it might be a wise thing for the minority to submit and permit the bill to go on its way undisputed.

And undoubtedly it would be if we were taking only a partisan view of it.

> It would be a policy of giving the opposition calf rope to hang itself. But the bill threatens the industrial welfare of the Nation too seriously to be tacitly tolerated, and its passage or defeat becomes a question involving much more than mere party advantage or disadvantage.
> The tariff question to-day is one that reaches above and below mere partisan politics. It is a question which involves not only the prosperity of our own country but the good will of the world. The present bill is nothing less than criminal in its stupidity.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert without reading—because I have not had an opportunity to read it, and it is rather long—an editorial just handed me by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] from the Ohio State Journal, which, I understand from the statement of the Senator from Ohio, criticizes this bill very severely. Does the Senator know of any influences on the part of department stores and importers that might overcome the scruples of this journal and cause it to depart from the course its judgment might dictate with reference to this question?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think anybody would presume to charge that that paper could be influenced editorially through its advertising columns.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

(From the Ohio State Journal of Saturday, June 3, 1922.)

DODGING THE QUESTION.

One of Senator MCCUMBER'S arguments for the tariff bill is that the many Republican newspapers which oppose that ill-timed, and we trust ill-starred, measure, and the number of them includes nearly all the more important and influential ones, are Democratic newspapers in disguise. Another is that the newspapers are all under department-store influence anyway, from which we gather, not having known it before, that the department stores are supposed to be actively opposing the McCumber-Fordney bill.

These fancies of the hard-pressed Senator are of course no arguments for the enactment of a foolish and harmful law, nor would they be even if they were facts. When a man publicly points out the error of some course you are bent upon, it is no answer at all to say that he is a sneak or an unworthy tool of somebody else, even if that were true. The only question which it is up to you to answer is, Is what he says true? If you dodge that question and begin to abuse him, thoughtful people see at once that you are pretty shaky in your mind about the defensibility of your own position. We have not seen any report of an attempt on Senator MCCUMBER'S part to prove the incorrectness of the arguments of the newspapers which he accuses of masquerading and subservience.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish now to read from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, a Republican paper which at present, I understand, has independent leanings. Heretofore it has been a consistent Republican paper.

All it (protection) should attempt to accomplish—

Says this paper—

is to establish equitable conditions of competition giving the American producer and manufacturer a fair opportunity. When it goes beyond that it operates to throttle commerce and to oppress the American consumers. The present tariff bill, we are convinced, goes far beyond this standard of protection, and in seeking to help industry will inevitably work injury to it. This bill has not been constructed with due regard to the public welfare, and it ought not to be passed in its present form.

Now, I want to read from the Chicago Tribune an editorial that has not heretofore appeared in the RECORD, and it ought to go in the RECORD. This editorial says:

The tariff makers are working on exactly the old logrolling methods which have been operative for decades. One man, desiring a high tariff on a certain commodity, regardless of its effect upon the country as a whole, agrees with another man desiring a high tariff on another commodity, regardless of its effect upon the public, that each will support the other's demands. They do so, the tariff is fixed on these two commodities, and the public interest is ignored.

The result is a tariff of exploitation rather than of protection. If such a bill is passed and becomes law, it will not do the Republican Party any good at the coming election. Each interest which is so advanced may cast a grateful ballot at a coming election, but even so they will be in a minority compared to the mass of voters who get high prices without high wages out of the arrangement.

Without reading, I ask leave to put in an article from the New York Herald.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE IRRATIONAL GLOVE TARIFF.

Senator SMOOT, of the Finance Committee, using the economic sense he possesses in large measure, tried to steer the mad McCumber tariff makers away from the folly which makes their glove schedules an irrational tariff. But they, like Mr. Littauer, thought they knew more than the world's economists and bankers, or, more likely, they didn't care so long as they piled up the duties.

Even if Mr. Littauer's dream of pre-war prices came true, a $2 specific duty on $8 was 25 per cent, but a 60 per cent duty on $8 is $4.80, or an increase of 140 per cent. And such treatment of American women, newly possessed of the ballot, is nothing less than political as well as economic lunacy.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now ask leave to put in another editorial from the New York Herald, in which the severest language used by any newspaper in referring to this bill is indulged in. I shall not read it, but I desire to have it go in the RECORD at this point to accompany these five or six other editorials.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HERALD'S TARIFF STAND.

The American Economist, which is the organ of the American Tariff League, is pained by the position of the New York Herald toward the Fordney-McCumber tariff makers. The American Economist thinks that the New York Herald "returns to its first love," free trade, "the faith in which it was established by James Gordon Bennett, the elder, and maintained by James Gordon Bennett, the younger." And the American Economist sees the New York Herald "as pronouncedly opposed to the protective tariff as it was under the Bennett régime."

What the New York Herald was in respect of political policies, economic principles, or anything else under its former ownerships has nothing to do with its principles and policies under its present ownership. As a matter of fact, the owner of the New York Herald is, always has been, and always expects to be a believer in a sound, rational, workable protective tariff for American industries and American labor.

The New York Herald, reflecting the protective principles and convictions of its owner, is a consistent and steadfast advocate of the American tariff system. But the owner of the New York Herald can not stand for damn fool protectionism, and the New York Herald will not stand for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of these editorials I have just put in the RECORD declares this bill is nothing less than criminal in its stupidity. Another declares that it is political and economic lunacy.

Another characterizes it as foolhardy and harmful, and another, the New York Herald, a Republican and protectionist organ, refers to it as "damn fool protectionism." I dislike to use those ugly words, but those are the descriptive words used in the quotation from these great Republican journals.

That is not all. I want to nail this business, because the Senator from North Dakota has stated the only reason which has been given by any Republican for this revolt of the Republican press of the country against this bill, and I want to nail it effectually before I leave it, to the end that it may clearly and unmistakably appear that this opposition on the part of the Republican press and the Republican business men of the country, who have openly declared against it, is the outcome of a conviction that the thing is not in the interest of the people or in conformity with the Republican theory of protection.

I have here before me the Literary Digest, which has assembled statements and comments in regard to this bill from Republican, independent, and Democratic papers published in different and widely separated sections of the country. An examination of this article will show that the Republican, independent, and nonpartisan papers which have criticized or declared opposition to the measure, according to the Literary Digest, greatly outnumber those given by it as supporting the bill. I take it the papers quoted were selected as papers representative of the parties in the different sections of the country.

I will read from the list only those papers classed as Republican, independent, and nonpartisan, commercial, and agricultural papers which are opposing this bill or severely criticizing it, so that it may appear how utterly ridiculous is the charge of the subsidizing of newspapers. The papers to which I shall refer are all Republican or independent papers, farm and trade journals.

The first journal in opposition or criticism noted by the Literary Digest is the Journal of Commerce, of New York, Republican. The second is the New York Tribune, Republican. The third is the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, a Republican paper also. The fourth is the Syracuse Post Standard, a Republican paper. The fifth is the Boston Transcript, an independent Republican newspaper. The sixth is the Ohio State Journal, from which I have just read, a Republican newspaper, as I understand. The seventh is the Business Farmer, of Mount Clemens, a Michigan agricultural newspaper. The eighth is the Southland Farmer, of Houston, Tex. The ninth is the New York American Agriculturist. The tenth is the St. Paul Dispatch. The eleventh is the Minnesota Journal. The twelfth is the New York Herald, Republican. The thirteenth is the New York Evening Post, Republican. The fourteenth is the New York Globe, Republican. The fifteenth is the Kansas City Star, independent Republican. The sixteenth is the Springfield Republican. The seventeenth is the Chicago Daily News, independent Republican; and the eighteenth is the Indianapolis News, independent Republican.

It will be seen that with the exception of five or six of those papers they are not great metropolitan journals, but are papers scattered about indiscriminately throughout the country, all Republican, independent, or nonpartisan.

Mr. President, I want now briefly to discuss that part of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota in which he discussed the tariff in connection with the samples he exhibited. For a long time, as the Senator proceeded with his argument, it was difficult for me to ascertain exactly what was his objective.

Finally, in response, I believe it was, to the senior Senator from Alabama, he told us that his main purpose was to show that the great department stores, which he claimed were the chief importers, were making enormous profits out of their importations by reason of the fact that they were both importers and retailers; that they got the high profits which the importer ordinarily makes, and, added to that, the enormous profits which the retailers of this country are making. That, we finally were assured, was his main objective. Yet, for more than half an hour the Senator stood before the Senate producing sample after sample of imported articles, explaining to the Senate that the invoice price or landed cost of the article was so-and-so, a very small price, and then giving the high retail selling price of the foreign article in the American market, declaring that the spread between those prices was attempted to be covered in his bill by a tariff duty of such a per cent ad valorem, and then he proceeded to discuss the utter inadequacy of that rate of duty to cover this wide spread.

He exhibited to the Senate, by way of illustration, an ordinary straw hat, which he said was an English hat, the invoice or landing cost being 69 cents, as he alleged, and he said that foreign-made hat, which cost 69 cents, sold at retail in the markets of the United States for $4.50. He pointed out the inadequate insufficiency of the tariff rates in his bill to cover that spread. Such was the argument and such was the statement of the Senator as to practically every article he exhibited. What was his purpose in declaring to the Senate that there was such a spread between the foreign price of the articles and their selling prices in the American market, if it was not to create the impression in the country that that spread was the thing at which the tariff should legitimately be leveled, and that the rates which he had put in his bill instead of being too high or excessive were utterly insufficient to cover that spread?

The Senator did not give the price charged by the American manufacturer for the comparable American product, the retail price of the domestic article. He gave us simply the two figures—the landing cost and the selling price in this market of the foreign article, which was, as we all now know, the retail selling price. When the Senator took his seat, an American citizen who was not familiar with the tariff and the basis on which tariff duties ought to be levied would have assumed that there was an advantage in favor of the foreigner, in the case of the hat, of about $3.80, which ought to be covered, under the theory of the pending bill, by a rate sufficient to measure that difference.

That was the line of argument and that was the impression which would have been conveyed but for the statement the Senator from North Dakota subsequently made in response to the observations upon his statement and argument by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. President, I think the subject ought to be dealt with fairly. I state right now that not an argument made by the Senator on yesterday, drawn from the prices which he gave with respect to the samples he displayed, had anything whatsoever to do with the question of the adequacy or the inadequacy of the rates in the bill, because it is not conceivable that anybody would maintain that a tariff upon an imported article should be sufficiently high to cover the difference between the invoice or manufacturer's price of the foreign article and the price at which that article sells at retail in the American market. The tariff has nothing properly to do with the high retail prices at which a foreign product sells in the American market.

The retail price at the present time, as we all know, of the domestic article or the retail price of the foreign article in our market to-day bears very little comparable relation to the cost of production in either this country or the foreign country in which the competing article is produced. At present, as well as during the war, in many, if not in most instances, the retail price is established and maintained in defiance and in violation of all economic laws, and that profiteering is the element of chief power in them. These retail prices are in many instances, as we know, from 200 to 300 and 400 per cent higher than the manufacturer's or the producer's price.

Take the common article of the Irish potato. That is an agricultural product. When that product leaves the hands of the producer in many instances the barrel of potatoes does not sell for more than 75 cents or $1. When it reaches the wholesaler it is probably sold by him to the retailer for $2 or possibly $2.50 a barrel. When the retailer divides it up and sells it by the peck or the quart, it has advanced in price to five, six, or seven dollars a barrel. So it is with all lines of business in the country. We know it. It is a matter of everyday experience and knowledge that the retail prices are excessive as compared with the original price obtained by the producer, and that at present profiteering is the chief element of weight in arriving at and fixing the price. But we are supposed to be framing a permanent tariff, and it is hoped there will soon be an end to these profiteering practices.

But why, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota—and I am sorry he is not in his seat this morning—is the retailer of the foreign article able to get such a high price in the American market for these foreign products which the Senator displayed? Is it not because, and solely because, the American product sells at an equally high or higher price in this market? If the hat which the Senator displayed cost only 69 cents and was sold in the retail market in this country for $4.50, undoubtedly it was because the domestic hat of like character and kind was being sold in the retail markets for at least $4.50.

If the Senator from North Dakota had wanted to be fair in this matter, I think he would not have made a comparison between the producer's price and the retail price in order to find the spread which should be measured by the tariff. What should he have done if he wished to make a fair comparison for the purpose of levying a tariff tax? Mr. President, he should have given the Senate not only the invoice or landing price of the foreign-made hat and of the other foreign-made articles which he exhibited here yesterday but he should have given us the American manufacturer's price for a similar and comparable hat. Those two prices would have been the basis of comparison for the purpose of ascertaining the tariff under the theory under which the bill is framed. And yet the Senate will bear me out when I state that in no instance on yesterday when the Senator from North Dakota was making, as he claimed, a tariff argument, when he was stating to the country the spread which ought to be covered by the tariff, did he undertake to give us what was the American manufacturer's selling price of any one of the articles he displayed. He gave us the foreign invoice price, which is the foreign manufacturer's price with no profit added except the manufacturer's profit, and he ought to have given us at the same time, if he wanted to make a proper comparison, the American manufacturer's selling price with no profit added except the manufacturer's profit. Then we would have had the spread which, according to the theory of this bill, ought to be covered by the tariff duty.

Did the Senator give them? Why did the Senator consume an hour of the time of the Senate in giving us the difference between the foreign invoice landed cost and the retail price at which the foreign products were sold in this market and telling us about the greatness of the spread and the inadequacy of the tariff rates which he is imposing to cover that spread? He knew as well as I know that the proper spread to be covered, according to the theory of the bill, was not the difference between the foreign invoice price and the retail price but the difference between the foreign invoice price and the American manufacturer's price. Why did not the Senator give these figures and facts to us? If the Senator will get those prices upon representative articles and transactions and present them to the Senate, I think it will be easy to show that the duties which he has imposed in this bill not only measure the spread but greatly exceed the spread and allow thereby the manufacturer to advance his present prices without fear of competition from abroad.

I heard a few days ago that this side show was to be staged here. I heard that a squad of appraisers had been organized and were flying about over the country from one port of entry to another port of entry trying to find cases to bolster up the rates in the bill, and that they were bringing in a line of samples which were a little later to be exhibited with dramatic stage effect to the Senate. I supposed, naturally, we were going to have samples of the foreign articles and samples of the domestic articles with which to make comparison, but we did not have any samples of domestic articles; we had only samples of foreign articles. I supposed the Senator from North Dakota was going to undertake to compare the landed cost of the foreign product with the domestic manufacturer's cost price in this country, and that he would have those two prices here at the time he compared the domestic sample with the foreign sample.

Supposing that, I read into the RECORD the day before yesterday a letter addressed to me by an importer, in which he said that the majority members of the Finance Committee, through the Tariff Commission, had requested him to send them a statement of his profits, and that he had very promptly complied, but that he had suggested that in order to be fair about it they ought also to get the profits of the American manufacturer and wholesaler, to compare his profits with their profits. The letter said that he had received a reply from the Tariff Commission saying that the Finance Committee had only asked them for the importer's profits; that they had not asked for the domestic wholesaler's or the domestic manufacturer's profits. I read that letter to the Senate and called the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to it and requested him to have the Tariff Commission ascertain the profits of the American producer or wholesaler of the articles upon which he had asked the importer's profits. I have not heard about it since, and I do not suppose I will ever hear about it again. Concealment and camouflage are the order of the day on the part of the proponents of the tariff measure.

Now, Mr. President, I stated in the outset that the speech of the Senator from North Dakota had but two objects:

One was to convince the country of the truth of his charge that the opposition to his bill from Republican and independent newspapers was the result of sinister influences upon those newspapers exerted by the importers and the department stores. I think that I have sufficiently exposed that pretense, if, indeed, it needed any further exposure.

The only other purpose of the Senator's argument seemed to be to draw a comparison between the producer's selling price of foreign products and the retail selling price in this country. I think that I have shown and shown conclusively that, so far from that being a tariff argument, by no stretch of the imagination could this spread possibly have anything to do with the laying of tariff taxes. Nobody has ever contended that tariff taxes should be levied on any such basis. I think if anybody ever should contend that tariff taxes should be levied on that basis, he would write himself down as an ass. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota would not think of making such a contention; and while his speech was undoubtedly calculated to leave the impression that he thought that was a spread which could properly be covered by a tariff, nevertheless I do not think he meant to have the Senate believe or to have the country believe that he thought the spread which he disclosed to the Senate—and that was all he did with his samples—was the proper measure of the tariff which should be imposed upon these particular articles in order to protect the American producer.

Mr. President, I regret that I have taken so much time this morning. Unfortunately I had not digested what I desired to say; in fact, I did not come to the Senate expecting to speak at all to-day; I did not expect to speak until after the naval appropriation bill should have been disposed of and the consideration of the tariff bill resumed; but under the advice of some of my colleagues I have ventured to make this speech at this time. I think I owe the Senate an apology for the length of time I have taken and for the rather disconnected and inadequate manner in which I have presented the views which I desired to convey to the Senate and the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 8785. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Mobridge Bridge Co., of Mobridge, S. Dak., to construct a pontoon bridge across the Missouri River;

H. R. 10330. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Croix at or near the city of Prescott, in the State of Wisconsin;

H. R. 11345. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Freeport, Pa.; and

H. R. 11827. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Women's Auxiliary Railway Mail Association, of Wichita, Kans., favoring the use of full steel construction and the best sanitary equipment on all cars in the Railway Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution of the Bismarck (N. Dak.) Rotary Club, favoring irrigation, reclamation, and water-power development in the source stream area of the Missouri-Yellowstone watershed, so as to control the flood menace in the Mississippi Valley, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the board of aldermen of the city of Chelsea, Mass., favoring the enactment of legislation to punish the perpetrators of lynchings, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by East Boston Post, No. 608, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, protesting against further reduction in the personnel of the Army and Navy, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorial of M. L. Whitis and sundry other citizens of Columbus, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6258) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 773) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2597) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys of the District of Columbia," approved September 25, 1914; reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 774) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on June 15, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

S. 2664. An act for the relief of Jesse Goodin;

S. 2666. An act for the relief of Ed Thomas and Pauline Thomas;

S. J. Res. 7. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate depositaries of public moneys in foreign countries and in the Territories and insular possessions of the United States; and

S. J. Res. 204. Joint resolution to authorize the loan by the Secretary of War to the commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans of cots for the use of the members of the United Confederate Veterans during the sessions of the national encampment of the United Confederate Veterans at Richmond, Va., from June 19 to 22, 1922.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3710) for the relief of the dependent widow and children of Herman Mednick, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3711) providing for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, and improvement of the Federal building located at the corner of Washington and Johnson Streets, Borough of Brooklyn, New York, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3712) granting an increase of pension to J. K. Taylor; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ERNST:

A bill (S. 3713) to establish a bureau of prohibition, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 9 on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made the Secretary will state the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Dillingham	Heflin	Ladd
Bursum	Edge	Hitchcock	La Follette
Cameron	Ernst	Jones, N. Mex.	Lenroot
Capper	Gerry	Jones, Wash.	Lodge
Caraway	Glass	Kellogg	McCormick
Curtis	Harreld	Kendrick	McCumber
Dial	Harris	King	McKinley

McNary	Overman	Sheppard	Underwood
Nelson	Pepper	Simmons	Wadsworth
Newberry	Phipps	Smoot	Walsh, Mass.
Nicholson	Pittman	Sterling	Walsh, Mont.
Norbeck	Poindexter	Sutherland	Watson, Ind.
Norris	Pomerene	Swanson	Willis
Oddie	Ransdell	Townsend

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether there have been any reductions in the number of civilian employees in the office of the Secretary of the Navy or whether this bill carries substantially the same appropriation for civilian employees in the Navy Department as in the past?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There have been a great many reductions in the number of civilian employees in the service, particularly in the navy yards, but I think there have been practically no reductions in the office of the Secretary.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether there have been any reductions in the number of civilian employees in the clerical force in Washington; and if not, why not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will give the Senator a statement showing the number of civilian employees in the Navy Department from June, 1916, down to the present time. On June 30, 1916, there were 787 civilian employees in the department; on December 31, 1918, as a result of the war, that number had been increased to 6,388; on February 28, 1922, the number had been reduced to 1,762; on April 30, 1922, the number was 768, and practically remains at that figure at the present time.

Mr. KING. Then there was an increase in the number during the year?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was an increase of six civilian employees on April 30, 1922. What the number is at the immediate moment I can not state.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the number is not so very large——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to say in that connection, by way of further explanation to the Senator, with regard to the numbers that I have given, that of the number of 6,388 civilian employees in the department on December 31, 1918, approximately 4,000 were naval reservists employed on work ordinarily performed by civilian employees.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not quite clear from the Senator's statement as to the situation respecting civilian employees. I notice in the next paragraph a provision headed "Temporary employees, Navy Department," and an appropriation is carried of $58,340. Running through the bill there will be found upon every few pages appropriations for "temporary employees" in various bureaus or agencies of the Navy Department. One would suppose that the period for "temporary employees" had ended, and that there would be with the bringing of the Navy down to what might be denominated a peace status a material reduction in the number of employees and a peace status number of civilian employees. May I inquire of the Senator why there is this appropriation for temporary employees in the Navy Department?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The purpose of that was to avoid the establishment on a permanent basis of these extra employees who were required by reason of the increase of the Navy and the increase of the naval activities during and following the war. It is much more economical to have them on a temporary basis than upon a permanent basis. It is to be hoped and expected that as we return to a reduced Naval Establishment many, if not all, of these employees can be dispensed with altogether. The Senator will notice that it is a House appropriation.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We had the benefit of a very determined effort on the part of the members of the House committee having charge of this bill to reduce the expenditures in every possible way.

Mr. KING. It will be perceived that in the particular item which has just been read by the Secretary $72,000 is appropriated for the compensation of the employees who are immediately under the control and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy—employees who might be denominated his immediate employees—but that item is followed by an appropriation of nearly as much, $58,340, for temporary employees in the same office. I recall that the appropriation bill a year ago introduced the same policy. It seems to me that the number of temporary employees is too great, and the amount appropriated is too great. We do not know the number, except that there is a limitation as to the amount which may be paid to any particular employee.

When we return to the bill I shall move to strike out the item of $58,340. I can not do it now, under the unanimous-consent rule that we shall consider only amendments which have been offered by the Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, Navy Department," on page 3, line 9, after the word "offices," to strike out "$70,000" and insert "$85,000," so as to read:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, and drawing materials; purchase and exchange of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons; maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons, and one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; garage rent; street car fares not exceeding $500; freight, expressage, postage, typewriters, and computing machines; necessary traveling expenses for collection of records not exceeding $100; and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $85,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator the reason for that increase. The House doubtless made a thorough investigation, and in view of the very liberal appropriations which are carried in the bill for overhead, I can not understand the reason for the increase in the item which has just been read by the Secretary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no increase in the appropriation carried in the bill on that account. The $15,000 added at that point is deducted on page 40 of the bill, line 23. It is occasioned by the transfer of certain appropriations hitherto carried under different heads, but really covering employees in the Navy Department, so that the appropriation will be made directly for the actual purpose for which it is used.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill contains very liberal appropriations for every bureau and every agency of the Government; and yet we find here this item of $85,000 for contingent expenses, notwithstanding, as I stated, the very liberal appropriations which are carried in the bill and which would seem to embrace every conceivable expenditure that might be made by the Navy Department.

I think those who had expected material reductions in the Navy bill will experience some disappointment when they are advised of the fact that the bill carries substantially $300,000,000. I am not sure as to the amount of obligations which will have to be met later on that are created by the bill, or how many executory contracts are authorized to be entered into which will pledge the Government to larger appropriations in the future; but the bill itself calls for direct appropriations of approximately $300,000,000, and in addition it authorizes, I think, the expenditure of unexpended balances which heretofore have been authorized and which aggregate a good many millions of dollars.

Anybody who reads this bill very carefully will be impressed with the fact that the overhead expenses are enormous. I do not know whether they are greater proportionately than those in the Army or not; but when you examine the bill, the various items, the provisions for civilians and for the multitude of activities herein provided for, the impression will grow and continue to grow that we are paying very dearly for our whistle. I do not recall just exactly the cost of the Navy per annum prior to 1916, but my recollection is that it was around $100,000,000 a year, and from that down. Notwithstanding the work of the Washington conference, which was hailed by some of our friends throughout the land as the greatest achievement of all time and as the great panacea for all the ills of the world and as a method to relieve the American people of the burdens of taxation, we are called upon to pay approximately $300,000,000 for the maintenance of the Navy for the coming year. The Army bill carries an appropriation which, as I recall, exceeds this; so that for the Army and Navy of this Republic in times of peace—a Republic which theoretically is pledged to peace throughout the world—we are to burden the American people with between six and seven hundred million dollars for the coming year.

Business is depressed; the people everywhere are groaning beneath the heavy burdens of taxation; and it has been averred that the Army and the Navy were to be the avenues through which we might pass to escape the oppressive burdens of taxation which were imposed upon the American people. Now we are confronted with the fact that the American people are to be taxed approximately $650,000,000 to $700,000,000 for the coming year, in time of peace, although before the war our appropriations for all purposes were approximately $1,000,000,000.

Our Republican friends who have control of Congress, who are shaping the legislation that is enacted, are not redeeming the promises which they made to the people to relieve them from these oppressive burdens. I think this bill carries at least fifty to seventy-five million dollars more than it ought to carry, and that by adequate pruning and by a proper consideration of the imperative needs of the Navy we could have subtracted from this bill at least fifty to seventy-five million dollars and have given to the American people an adequate and up-to-date Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Printing and binding," on page 3, after line 18, to insert:

That portion of the appropriation for the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year 1922 which may be necessary to execute printing and binding for the Navy Department under orders placed with the Public Printer during the fiscal year 1922, within the total allotment to the Navy Department for that fiscal year, is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year 1923 for that purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise to inquire of the Senator if under existing law there was no obligation upon the part of the Government Printing Office, or the custodian of the money, or the agency to which it was appropriated, to cover into the Treasury of the United States any unexpended balance?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There would not be any obligation to cover it in at least until the end of the fiscal year; and the purpose is to make the money which has already been appropriated available to do the work which has accumulated for the current fiscal year, not the work that is to be current in the fiscal year covered by this bill. This reappropriation of the money is to make it available for the work for which it was originally appropriated, but which has not been done, due to causes of various kinds in the Government Printing Office which made them behind in the current work.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator the amount that will be unexpended at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In the neighborhood of $100,000.

Mr. KING. Is any appropriation carried in the bill, other than this reappropriation, for the same work which was to be performed by this appropriation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; this is the only appropriation for that work. There is an appropriation in the bill for current work for the year 1923, but not for the work that is on hand now.

Mr. KING. Then there will be no method, except by going to the books and tracing the various appropriation bills and the items, of determining just what was expended for printing for the fiscal year 1922 and for the fiscal year 1923?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It could be very easily determined by an examination of the accounts of the Government Printing Office showing what work was done with this money, thereby determining what work for the year 1922 was paid for out of this appropriation, and what work was done for the year 1923 which would be paid for out of the appropriation for that year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I know that the habit of carrying over appropriations has been persisted in until it almost has the force of law. It would be far better, it seems to me, not only for economy but for accuracy, and in order to determine just what the expenditures are from year to year, if at the end of a fiscal year any amount which remains unappropriated should be covered into the Treasury, and then, if additional money is required to complete some incomplete work, application should be made in the regular way and the appropriation obtained in the regular way. I think the present condition makes for extravagance and waste, and for a sort of lax and confused method of performing work.

SALE OF LIQUORS ON AMERICAN SHIPS.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall interrupt the consideration of the pending bill just a minute. I notice that Mr. Lasker, of the Shipping Board, says you can not run a ship without liquor. I should like to remind him that you can not run a blind tiger without liquor, either. People have not been very successful in running saloons without liquor. You could not very well run a gambling joint without it. There are any number of institutions we might name which thrive upon the sale of liquor. However, I have never before known an officer of the United States to undertake to defend the violation of the law on the ground of necessity.

Of course, Mr. Lasker does not pretend to be a lawyer; he is an expert on publicity, and nothing else, Lasker publicity; but there is no lawyer, however he may have been limited in his practice—the Senator from North Dakota intimated yesterday that we were running a justice of the peace court here in the Senate Chamber—there is no lawyer who has practiced law even in that high court who would pretend that they can sell whisky or wine or intoxicating liquors of any kind on board American ships anywhere without violating the law. Any lawyer who had waived his examination and been admitted to the bar who would assert that in any decent company would be laughed out of court. It is a question of determining to sell whisky though the law says it shall not be sold.

What pains me more is that Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, who is presumed to sit here as the guardian of the prohibition forces of this country, who, I have understood, has claimed that all prohibition legislation has originated in his office, should connive at this open, flagrant violation of the law. He says that the man who called attention to the violation of the law was trying to discredit prohibition. That may be good logic for Wayne B. Wheeler, but no one else will accept it. Whenever the time comes that the man who calls attention to a violation of the law is the man who encourages violation of the law, of course that ends law enforcement, and when Mr. Wheeler made that statement he was not any more candid than in the statement he made to me about the judges' bill, which he would not affirm over his own signature. I voted for prohibition. I do not think we have always gotten out of it the good effects the legislation ought to bring. I have sometimes been disappointed in its effect. People have not always accepted the view I entertained, and all communities have not looked with favor upon the law. But I have never before known a law-enforcing officer to apologize for not enforcing the law, and expect people to commend him for it.

The Attorney General says he will hold to the opinion rendered by former Assistant Attorney General Frierson, a Democrat, until the courts shall decree otherwise. Mr. Lasker says he will hold to the opinion of a lawyer, whose name is so much like beer that I can not pronounce it, until the courts hold otherwise. Mr. Haynes says that between the two he is not going to do anything, and Mr. Wheeler, the guardian of prohibition, and who is paid for that, says that any man who calls attention to the sale of liquor is trying to discredit prohibition.

Between them and among them they are countenancing an open, flagrant, daily violation of the law. Whether a man be for prohibition or against it, he ought to be for law enforcement, and when the time has come that the highest officials of the land—the Attorney General and the chairman of the Shipping Board, and, aside from these, the accredited agent of all the temperance people of America—shall condone the sale of liquor, open and flagrant, and apologize, one saying you can not run a ship without it, another saying that somebody else said they can do it legally, and the man who is charged with the enforcement says that as between the two opinions he can not do anything, I am curious to know what the temperance people are going to do.

I know, and every lawyer knows, that wherever the American flag flies over an American ship it is American territory, and a violation of the law of America upon that ship is a violation of the law as much as if it took place here under the shadow of the dome of this Capitol. It is childish, it is foolish, it is dishonest for anyone to make any other contention.

I do not believe the Attorney General is going to try to enforce the law against the sale of liquor, although he is the chief law officer of this Nation, and yet he says:

I understand that a former Assistant Attorney General has ruled it is a violation of the law, and I will acquiesce in his decision, but do nothing until somebody else gets the matter to the courts and ascertains what the courts will say—

Which means no enforcement, and everybody might as well understand it. All the millions of women through the States who have been praying for prohibition, who have been working for prohibition, who have believed that it meant the salvation of the race, may as well realize now as later that there is to be no enforcement of prohibition as long as the present Attorney General is at the head of the law-enforcing branch of the Government. I do not care whether he was ever in a court or not—and I understand he never was in a court to try a case—I know a man can not hang around a justice of the peace court as many years as he has without knowing that it is a violation of the law to sell whisky on an American ship, when it is a violation of the law to sell whisky in the District of Columbia under our national amendment and prohibition law.

I presume that when our friends on the other side bring in a ship subsidy bill one item in it will be for so many hundred thousand or millions of dollars for the purchase of whisky to be sold on the subsidized American ships, because Mr. Lasker says you can not run them without it, that it would be suicide to run a ship without selling whisky on it. Therefore, if you are going to tax the people to run the ships be candid and say that so much is for the subsidy and so much for keeping the liquor stock always replenished.

I can see my friend, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who has been so ardently fighting in the ranks of prohibition, voting enthusiastically for a ship subsidy, with a certain knowledge that he is voting to license as many saloons as we have ships. If he votes for a ship subsidy every man and woman in Ohio will know that he voted to license a saloon, and every other man who votes for a subsidy will vote to license saloons. Then, if they want to be fair, if the rich, who are able to travel on ships, are to be permitted to buy whisky, why not legalize saloons here, where the workingman can always get his drink? Let us not play favorites. Let us proclaim to the world that we were hypocrites—as some people have suspected—and that we believe in selling whisky, but that we want to do it under a pretense that we are subsidizing ships. That is all it is.

Wayne B. Wheeler, for whom I have had some respect heretofore, and have not a bit now, after reading the opinion that he is alleged to have given out, that he thinks that one who calls attention to the violation of the law is fighting prohibition, and his other pretense that we need more legislation. He wants a 25-mile limit instead of a 3-mile limit. If you can legally cross the 3-mile limit with a cargo of liquor, you could cross 25 miles, and the thirsty could hold their breath until they got out of the 25-mile limit. It is such a cheap subterfuge, such a patent endeavor to accept the money of the prohibitionists of this country and tolerate the open, notorious violation of the law.

I hope—I will not say hope, because that implies expectation, and I have not any—but in the interest of decency I wish some of you gentlemen close to the Attorney General would ask him to enforce one law. I will not be hard on him and ask him to enforce more, because I do not think he would do it, but he ought to enforce this one law, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who has always rushed to the defense of the Attorney General when anybody criticized him, ought to go to him and say, "Mr. Attorney General, in the interest of common decency now let us enforce this law." I appeal to the Senator from Ohio, as soon as he can get some one to take the chair, to call on his friend from Ohio to put an end to this shameful traffic in liquor.

The Senator from Ohio was a lecturer for the Anti-Saloon League, I understand, and hails from the same State from which come Mr. Wheeler and the Attorney General, and clear out into Arkansas we look to that trio to keep us dry. I have no kind of influence with any of them, except the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], and I am appealing to him to urge upon Mr. Wheeler and the Attorney General to have this one law enforced.

However light this may seem to some people, I know that there are millions of people in this country who look upon the violation of this law with more disfavor than upon the violation of any other law on the statute books. It is an insult to them. It is a disappointment to them. It is a shameful violation of the law to permit this open, flagrant running of saloons under the guise of running ships. I hope that before there is brought before the Congress for its consideration a ship subsidy bill these men will be dissuaded from asking us to vote away $100,000,000 a year to enable people to run saloons. I use the word "hope" as applying to my friend the Senator from Ohio, in whom I have confidence, whom I know to be a good man, whom I know to be a sincere man, and whom I know to be influential with these two gentlemen whose names I have mentioned, and I believe he will have them stop this outrageous violation of the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has called attention to an agency of the Government which has been the subject of criticism almost from the hour of its creation. In my opinion it has merited much of the criticism leveled against it, and its present policies have not tended to blunt the sharp edge of public criticism. No Government agency has been more extravagant and inefficient. Its officials in the past and those who now control it seem indifferent to public censure. If there were any hope of reforms or improvement, there would be a disposition to cover the past with a mantle of charity. There is much advertisement and publicity and promise upon the part of those who direct the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but there are no achievements and no satisfactory developments.

And now Mr. Lasker and others connected with this corporation are engaged in an intensive and extensive drive to secure a ship subsidy. Some of these officials are carrying on a vigorous propaganda to force public opinion and to put through the bill formulated by Mr. Lasker and his aids and subordinates.

I had supposed that when Congress created boards and commissions and Federal positions and executive agencies it was the duty of the persons selected for service therein to execute the law, to perform the duties defined by statute, and to not spend their time as crusaders and propagandists in support of some plan to extend their authority or some policy which the administration desired to force through the National Congress.

President Harding has the right to recommend to Congress the passage of a subsidy bill. That is his business. I think his policy is unwise, and I shall oppose it. But it is no part of the duty of executive employees to spend their time and efforts as missionaries to carry forward Mr. Harding's plans. Mr. Lasker and the members of the board and other agencies of the Government should devote their energies to the discharge of their duties; their time ought to be devoted to the execution of the law and not to carrying on propaganda in favor of executive policies. If they so conduct themselves, I think they ought to be called to account; perhaps their salaries ought to be cut off. They might then give their attention to their duties, instead of engaging in propaganda and spending their time advocating policies which will increase their authority and extend the functions and powers of executive agencies.

I think it has become a public scandal the manner in which some executive officials spend their time in writing, in crusading, in engaging in various activities throughout the country to drive through policies which some executive department or agency desires and which will increase their authority, augment their power, and multiply the number of Federal employees. Mr. Lasker is now engaged in the pleasing task of writing articles in favor of a ship subsidy, and we are told that others connected with the Shipping Board are giving some of their time to the task of converting the American people to the beauties of a ship subsidy. Who appointed them and paid them to carry on a propaganda in favor of a policy to which a large number of the American people are opposed? Mr. Lasker was not appointed to the position which he occupies in order to be a missionary in favor of a ship-subsidy scheme which will further tax the American people. I respectfully submit that he is subject to criticism because of his partisan efforts and persistent zeal to secure a ship subsidy of millions of dollars annually.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. If this, to me, so absurd ruling is correct that a ship goes beyond the law and the protection of the law when it goes beyond the 3-mile limit, what is there to indicate that an American ship is American territory at all? If they can violate the liquor law that way, could they not cut the captain's throat and there be no law to punish them?

Mr. KING. The Senator from Arkansas is an able lawyer, and I think he can answer that question perhaps better than I can. I suppose that one of the evidences that it is an American ship is that the Stars and Stripes fly from the masthead.

Mr. CARAWAY. But if the one law can be ignored as soon as they get beyond the 3-mile limit does any other law follow the ship?

Mr. KING. The question of the Senator answers itself. Obviously not. I agree with the Senator that the law should be enforced. I believed the eighteenth amendment to be unwise. I thought it was an infringement upon the rights of the States, that it interfered with their sovereign powers, and would prove a dangerous precedent which would eventually lead to the destruction of the police powers of the States; but it has become a part of the organic law of the Republic and we ought to enforce it. Those who violate the Volstead Act or other laws passed pursuant to the eighteenth amendment should be punished as the courts punish those who violate other laws of the land.

Mr. CARAWAY. The thing I was inquiring about, because I have a great deal of admiration for the legal learning of my friend the Senator from Utah, is if this law will not follow the ship and the flag, no other law can do so, and anybody could seize one of our ships outside the 3-mile limit and plunder us of every dollar's worth of goods. There would be no law to punish them, because the ship ceases to be American territory when it gets beyond the 3-mile limit. It is so absurd that the very quarrel we had with Germany would reflect upon us, because she never came within the 3-mile limit to sink any of our ships. She waited until they got outside and then sunk them. Now, the question of the law being enforced is raised in this way, and there is no law to protect the American and to prevent the violation of American law on an American ship when it is beyond the 3-mile limit. It is so absolutely absurd that it ought to shock everybody.

Mr. KING. I am a little surprised to learn that Mr. Wheeler, to whom the Senator has referred, should entertain the views which the Senator expresses, because I have a rather indistinct recollection that Mr. Wheeler or others representing the Anti-Saloon League some time ago insisted that we enact a law which would prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in China by Americans.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why, of course.

Mr. KING. They wanted the laws of the United States to extend to China and other countries if Americans happened to be there. How they could advocate that policy and yet advocate the vending of liquors upon American ships is something I can not quite understand.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to get another opinion from the Senator from Utah. I was shown a statement issued by Mr. Wheeler a while ago by the Representative from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLY, in which Wheeler said he wants the law amended so that we shall have a 25-mile limit instead of a 3-mile limit. Can the Senator see any virtue in that? If they can legally cross the 3-mile limit with a floating saloon, they could cross the 25-mile limit as well, could they not?

Mr. KING. I think if a man wants to drink liquor or a ship wants to sell liquor the distance between the 3-mile limit and the 25-mile limit will quickly be covered.

Mr. CARAWAY. And where does the efficacy come in? If the 3-mile limit has no legal effect, what effect would the 25-mile limit have? Does the law depend upon the number of miles?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps it would enable them to secure a better price.

Mr. CARAWAY. They would be able to charge a higher price when they got out beyond the 25-mile limit.

Mr. KING. It may be the purpose to increase the speed of the ships after they cross the 3-mile limit in order to reach the 25-mile limit.

Mr. CARAWAY. And come in more slowly.

Mr. KING. Yes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 12, to strike out:

EXPERIMENTAL AND RESEARCH LABORATORY.

For laboratory and research work and other necessary work of the experimental and research laboratory for the benefit of the naval service, as authorized in the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, including the construction of temporary test houses, additions to equipment, the operation of a laboratory, maintenance of buildings and grounds, and the employment of scientific civilian assistants as may become necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, $100,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for technical, drafting, clerical, and messenger service shall not exceed $25,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to have some information from the Senator in charge of the bill with reference to this amendment. It is apparently intended to eliminate the experimental research laboratory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was unable to hear the Senator on account of the confusion in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not make some explanation of the item. It is apparently intended to eliminate the experimental and research laboratory. That feature of our Naval Establishment, it will be recalled, was inaugurated by virtue of the act of August 29, 1916, upon, as my recollection is, the suggestion and earnest advocacy of Mr. Edison, who felt that the Navy ought to have the benefit of whatever inventive genius there is in the country. I supposed this was a very general and popular feature of our Naval Establishment. I should like to know what impelled the committee to take this course.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think, so far as its being popular is concerned, very little is known about the laboratory. I doubt very much whether anybody knows what it consists of or what it is doing. As a matter of fact, it is a group of more or less expensive buildings at a place called Bellevue, in the District of Columbia, on the shores of the Potomac River. There is nothing going on there at all except construction work on the buildings. There seems to be little or no equipment in the buildings. The appropriation of $100,000 carried in the bill could not possibly result in any very great amount of scientific work being done. It looked to the committee as though it would be throwing $100,000 away. It does not amount to anything more than the employment of a lot of supernumeraries connected with the laboratory without accomplishing any result.

I am in entire accord with the Senator from Montana, if I understood him correctly, as to the desirability of promoting scientific study as to naval equipment, naval appliances, and machinery.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on page 26 the bill carries an appropriation of $200,000 for an engineering experiment station at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md. That experiment station is in operation. It has been in operation for some years. The committee felt that scientific experiments ought to be carried on there and that that station should be properly supported, rather than waste a portion of our money on a large, expensive embryo establishment at Bellevue. That establishment is really an outgrowth of the war or of preparation for the war. We are confronted in this case, as we are in many other cases, with the question of getting back to normal conditions, on the one hand, or, on the other hand, of going on with more or less extravagant and exaggerated activities which never would have been established but for the war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not think the items to which the Senator has called our attention, for the continuance of the experiment station at the Naval Academy, meets the conditions for which the experimental and research laboratory was established. The experiment station at the academy, as a matter of course, is conducted by the officers of the Navy. About the time that the war broke out, or prior thereto, a large number of inventions were offered to the Navy by inventors throughout the country. Most of them were rejected, and in all probability deservedly so, and yet our experience has disclosed that the naval officers do not know all about those things, and frequently inventions are made by people outside of both the Army and the Navy which prove invaluable in the course of time. I think we have had some rather sad experiences about the rejection of inventions of American inventors which were afterwards adopted by foreign countries.

There was a general opinion prevailing that there was a prejudice existing in the Navy Department against inventions which came from civilians. Apparently Mr. Edison shared the suspicion that the civilian inventor was not accorded the consideration to which he was entitled. No doubt Congress believed as much and made provision for the establishment of this experimental and research laboratory, where inventions which seemed to give some promise might, as I understood it, be tried out. In that connection the Naval Consulting Board was established, Mr. Edison, my recollection is, acting as chairman of the board. That seems to have gone by the board in this appropriation bill also, for the next amendment in the bill disposes of the appropriation for that purpose. My attention is called to this, Mr. President, by a very distinguished engineer, formerly of my State but now residing in New York. I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read a letter which I have received from him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

NAVAL CONSULTING BOARD OF THE UNITED STATES,
New York, June 14, 1922.

Hon. T. J. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you this letter as a member and vice chairman of the Naval Consulting Board of the United States, which organization during the war realized in attempting to carry on its work to the best advantage the lack of an experimental laboratory for Navy use, and the board, through its chairman, Mr. Edison, was instrumental in securing an appropriation from Congress for the building and maintenance of the laboratory. An appropriation of $100,000 for operating the laboratory located on the Potomac River near Washington was also made, and likewise an item of $4,000 to defray the expenses of the Naval Consulting Board.

I am in receipt of a letter from Rear Admiral W. Strother Smith, in which he states that the Senate has cut out the item of $100,000 for operating the laboratory, and also the item of $4,000 for the Naval Consulting Board, including the Naval Consulting Board clerk in the office at Washington.

It is my judgment that each of the above sums of money is necessary for the purpose for which it was appropriated, and I trust that you will be willing to use your influence in the Senate to have these two items put back on the bill. I can assure you that we shall appreciate your efforts in this direction to the utmost.

I am sending a similar letter to Senator MYERS.

With kindest regards, I am, as always,

Yours very truly, B. B. THAYER.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think it was understood at the time that the establishment of such research work designed to afford to civilian inventors an opportunity to have their inventions tried out was never in very high favor with the officers of the Navy, and I suppose that that prejudice is to a very large degree responsible for the failure to realize the expectations which were entertained concerning the development of this feature of the Naval Establishment. The Senator in charge of the bill advises us that nothing has ever been accomplished. Perhaps nothing was to be expected when the administration was left in the hands of people who were unfriendly to the enterprise from the start.

I have no interest in the matter except that I want to call attention to the fact that this promising feature of the Naval Establishment which was inaugurated in the interests of civilian inventors, so that the Navy could get the benefit of whatever inventive genius there might be outside of the officers of the Navy themselves, goes by the board and is not going to be supported any more.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, perhaps it might throw a little light on the subject if I were to read an excerpt from the statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The laboratory has not as yet been entirely completed. When properly equipped, possibly it might do a great deal of useful work and be placed in the category of desirable public activities; but the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, in his testimony before the House committee, when asked how the work was being done at present, said:

> The sort of work that we expect will be done at the laboratory is now being undertaken at the Washington Navy Yard and by the Bureau of Standards.

The amount of money for which request was made would be used mainly to create a new staff of experts and to pay the wages of those employed to assist in the work. No doubt the activities of such a laboratory when properly equipped would be very useful to the Navy, but in the view of the committee it is not absolutely necessary at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator advise us exactly what has been done in the laboratory heretofore?

Mr. NEWBERRY. As I have stated, the laboratory is not finished, and nothing has been done as yet.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How much money has been spent upon it?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I think about a million and a half dollars have been spent upon it; but I am not certain as to the amount.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A million and a half dollars have been spent upon it. We have entered upon this enterprise, have spent a million and a half dollars on it, have never got anywhere on it, and now we are going to abandon it?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I think the laboratory has not as yet been equipped or even finished. I am corrected in my statement in regard to the expenditures, which, I am now informed, have been $1,200,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The situation is, then, that we entered upon the plan and system of establishing a laboratory in which could be tested out inventions of civil inventors which were supposed to be of some value in connection with naval operations. Having entered upon that plan, we spent $1,200,000, but the laboratory has not yet been completed; the system has never been tried out; and we now propose to abandon it and to allow the civilian inventors to take their chances so far as devices of use to the Navy are concerned.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a word, if the Senator will permit me. The appropriation contained in the House bill makes no change whatever in that respect. If this laboratory is established and maintained, there is nothing proposed that would change the control of it; it would still remain under the Navy Department, under naval officers, and the same attention would be given to civilian inventors and their inventions without this appropriation that would be given with it. There would not be any change whatever in that respect. A great many experiments are being carried on by the Navy Department, particularly at the navy yard at Philadelphia, as to new methods of the use of fuel, in which a great deal of scientific progress has been made, involving a great saving of money to the Navy by reducing the amount of fuel which is consumed.

I have received the same complaints, and I have had the same feeling to which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has referred about the apathy and sometimes the apparent hostility of naval officers toward the inventions that are submitted to them; but I was merely calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that that situation would not be involved or changed in any way at all by the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington means, of course, that the naval officers will be in control of the laboratory to be constructed, and that civilian inventors will be subject to exactly the same depressing influences; but my understanding is that the naval consulting board has a persuasive voice in connection with the operations of the research laboratory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I do not think the naval consulting board has any authority over the laboratory at all under the law. Furthermore, the naval consulting board did not accomplish a great deal. I have known several members of the naval consulting board, some of whom were men of great distinction as practical inventors and highly scientific. They were very badly treated by the majority of the naval consulting board. It seemed to resolve itself into factions and quarrels among its members, and I thought a great deal of injustice was done by the majority of the naval consulting board to some men on the board who, as was proved by subsequent events, had their criticisms and suggestions been adopted, would have been of immense value to the Navy. But, so far as the practical results of the activities of the naval consulting board are concerned, I think the Senator from Montana would have some difficulty in pointing them out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter upon any defense of the Naval Consulting Board, but my understanding was that the Naval Consulting Board was not supposed to know very much about the operation of ships or, perhaps, even about the construction of ships, nor about the general activities of the Navy. I associated the Naval Consulting Board with the movement to establish a research laboratory in the interest of the civilian inventors, and that the two appropriations go together here and that they fall together has confirmed me in the belief that the two are associated. So I imagine very likely that the civilian inventor whose invention went into the research laboratory had some kind of a proper consideration in that the laboratory was, in some way at least, under the control or supervision of the Naval Consulting Board, consisting of civilians.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him in order to ask a question of the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will one or the other of the two Senators tell the Senate how and under what circumstances the construction of this laboratory was begun? Was an appropriation made for it in an appropriation bill or was it provided for in a lump-sum appropriation during the war?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was a special appropriation in the act of 1916, at the time when the Navy entered upon its enlarged program, undoubtedly through the apprehension created by the European war, although it was before we entered the war.

Mr. McCORMICK. How long has it been since any work has been done on the laboratory?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is some work under way toward the completion of the building.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has work toward the completion of the building been carried on during the last year?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the act of August 29, 1916, was the act in which this country got ready for war. I was acting chairman of the Naval Committee at that time, and those who knew the situation were satisfied that ultimately this country would get into war with Germany.

Mr. McCORMICK. When was that?

Mr. SWANSON. I refer to the act of August 29, 1916.

Mr. McCORMICK. That was before the election of that year?

Mr. SWANSON. It was August 29, 1916.

Mr. McCORMICK. Was it before the election of that year that those to whom the Senator refers were satisfied that we were going to war?

Mr. SWANSON. I am not indulging in petty politics, although the Senator does not seem to be able to get above it. The act itself shows what preparations were made; the act speaks for itself better than the Senator from Illinois or I, in a partisan way, could speak for it. That act, on account of the emergency, increased the Navy from 55,000 to 87,000 men, and authorized the President, if he saw proper, to make a survey of all the navy yards and of all the ships. At that time we were trying to get ready for war. The act to which I have referred was really designed, if the emergency should arise, to be prepared for it. That is the reason I may say the Navy was ready when war was declared, regardless of any election. All that it is necessary to do in order to be satisfied of that fact is to read the act itself.

In that act a provision was also made to secure the services and cooperation of the inventors and scientific men of the country, so as to obtain the benefit of their labor and their knowledge. We could not get a scientist to work for the Navy unless he was given a commission. The act which I have mentioned authorized the employment of men such as Edison, men who were particularly expert in connection with the telephone and telephone inventions, and also explosives. At the same time a laboratory was established. I may say that Mr. Edison did splendid work. The listening device, to a large extent, was evolved by the consulting board, and it proved to be really one of the best means of fighting the submarine. I might also mention the depth bomb. Other civilians outside of the Navy did splendid work.

The provision was put in the bill as a war measure in order to enable the Navy to get ready for hostilities. Various scientists were employed. Mr. Edison was down here for months. He invented a method by which a ship could be so painted as to reduce its visibility to such an extent that the chances of a submarine on coming to the top seeing it would be lessened by at least one-half. Other schemes were devised for painting ships so as to deceive a pursuing ship and give the impression that it was going north when it was really going south.

I repeat that the establishment of the research laboratory and the Naval Consulting Board was a war measure. I am not prepared to say whether the work should be continued; I am willing to let the amendment proposed prevail so that the matter may go to conference. I have not examined to see whether or not the laboratory and the work proposed to be carried on there should be continued, but I know that the members of the Naval Consulting Board performed a valuable service. They came here and served practically without any pay whatever during the war and aided very materially in developing inventions and discoveries which were of great benefit to the Navy, as well as rendering service in consultation and advice.

I simply desire not to have the work of those men reflected on. They took no pay; they were down here at great loss and inconveniece to themselves; their own business was neglected; and they did splendid work, from my knowledge of them, during the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before we pass from this subject I desire to place in the RECORD the provisions of the act of 1916 for the establishment of the experimental and research laboratory. It is found on page 570 of volume 39 of the Statutes at Large, and reads as follows:

Experimental and research laboratory: For laboratory and research work on the subject of gun erosion, torpedo motive power, the gyroscope, submarine guns; protection against submarine, torpedo, and mine attack; improvement in submarine attachments, improvement and development in submarine engines, storage batteries and propulsion, airplanes and aircraft, improvement in radio installations, and such other necessary work for the benefit of the Government service, including the construction, equipment, and operation of a laboratory, the employment of scientific civilian assistants as may become necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy (limit of cost not to exceed $1,500,000), $1,000,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing or interfering with the continuation or undertaking of necessary experimental work during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, as heretofore conducted under other appropriations: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall make detailed reports to the Congress not later than June 30, 1917, and annually thereafter, showing the manner in which all expenditures hereunder have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 7, to strike out:

CIVILIAN NAVAL CONSULTING BOARD.

For actual expenses incurred by and in connection with the civilian naval consulting boards, including the services of one clerk, at $1,400 per annum, for duty in connection with the board at Washington, D. C., $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Office of Judge Advocate General. Salaries, Navy Department," on page 9, after line 10, to insert:

To pay George Melling for compiling the laws and decisions relating to the Navy, Navy Department, and Marine Corps made prior to July 1, 1922, including an index thereto, and in accordance with Senate resolution of March 30, 1914, $3,000, to be available upon completion of said work.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before proceeding to consider this amendment, may I inquire of the Senator for information, calling attention to lines 7 to 13, page 7, if in view of the reduction in the number of marines—and I will add, in passing, that the number should be still further reduced—it is necessary to employ private schools for the instruction of marines? My understanding is that we are providing at San Diego and elsewhere very adequate and efficient schools for the instruction of marines, and I am wondering whether it is necessary now to make provision to pay various States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator misunderstands the purpose of that provision. It does not relate to marines technically at all. It relates to sailors. It does not affect the Marine Corps in any way whatever.

I will say to the Senator that these schools are entirely different schools from the naval training stations. They are maintained by the States. These sums are purely for the purpose of cooperating with the States. I think three States have expended some $50,000 for the maintenance of these nautical schools. The experience of those schools and everybody who is familiar with those schools seems to have demonstrated that they are of immense value, far beyond the expense incident to them, in the development of the young men, even aside from promoting their usefulness and serviceability in the Navy. The parents of boys who have attended these schools are very loud in their praises of the effect upon the youths who have been trained there. They are schools maintained by the States. This provision is to reimburse the States for one-half the amount of money which they have expended.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the Senator to mean that enlisted men of the Navy are sent, after their enlistment, to these schools which are maintained by the States for instruction in the duties which they would be compelled to perform in the naval service?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. KING. Then is this a mere gratuity by the Federal Government to the States to aid them in developing a sort of a nautical branch of their educational institutions?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The purpose of it in the Navy bill is not as a gratuity at all, but it is considered in the interest of the public policy of the country to encourage the States in assisting in the maintenance of a place where young men can be instructed in the ways of the sea and at the same time disciplined to a certain extent, so that they are available not only for the merchant marine but in time of emergency would be available for the Navy. It is not regarded as a gratuity. It is regarded by the Congress—because this is simply a repetition of what Congress has done for a number of years—as the promotion of a good public policy for the country.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand—I want to get the matter clearly in my mind—a number of the States in some institutions which are maintained by public taxation have instructors who give some sort of instruction or some training in naval matters to young men who come to the State institutions?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not in naval matters but in nautical matters, which knowledge, of course, would be useful in case they should be called into the Navy.

Mr. KING. Just the same as it would be important, perhaps, that young men should know something of astronomy if they were called into the Navy; but the point I am trying to get at is that the States are maintaining certain schools, and in those schools some attention is paid to nautical matters, and the States make contributions to those schools, because they teach nautical matters?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is just the other way. The States maintain the schools and the Federal Government makes contributions to them.

Mr. KING. But there are no employees of the Government, no sailors of the Government, in those schools?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there is one of these schools in my State. The schools are conducted on ships which are maintained by the States. This $25,000 is given under an act of Congress, so that it is given by law.

Mr. KING. I was aware of that fact, because I know it has been carried in a number of appropriation bills.

Mr. LODGE. The act was passed in 1911, and for a long time there were only two States, Massachusetts and New York, and I think Oregon, but I do not know. That seems to have dropped out. I suppose it has given up the school. Pennsylvania is new.

Mr. KING. I ask for information: Has the Senator made any investigation in his own State so that he is convinced that those schools are beneficial?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, very; they are very good; and they are maintained really by the States. They have a commissioned officer on the ship in my State, and have maintained it for a great many years, and the school is on a ship.

Mr. KING. Then the amount contributed by the Federal Government would not be sufficient, of course, to maintain the school?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. And the benefit to the Government is indirect——

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. KING. In that young men who attend there may subsequently come into the Navy and have the advantage of the nautical training which they have received in the State school?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is exactly it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Naval training station, California," on page 13, line 24, after the word "Island," to strike out "and San Diego," so as to read:

Maintenance of naval training station, Yerba Buena Island, Calif.: For labor and material; buildings and wharves; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wharfage, ferriage, and street-car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock, and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, tools, and repairs to same; fire engines and extinguishers; gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and materials, and maintenance of same; heating and lighting; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; fresh water, and washing; packing boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses; maintenance of dispensary building; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; in all, $125,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, on account of additional information which has been received since that amendment was proposed, in view of the fact that the Navy now is in a period of transition so far as this training school is concerned between San Francisco and San Diego, and that a part of the year the school will probably have to be maintained at San Francisco and a part of the year at San Diego, I ask to have that amendment rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of what I understand to be the facts from letters which I have received, I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee whether he believes it necessary to have two naval stations in California?

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

Mr. KING. If I may state what my information is first, then I shall be very happy to have the Senator answer.

As I understand, at San Francisco Bay there is now a very excellent naval training station. One of the islands in that magnificent bay has been used for that purpose for a number of years. The Senator knows that many of our ships will be anchored there constantly. We shall have all classes of ships in that great harbor, both capital ships, submarines, and all kinds of naval craft. It would seem that San Francisco Bay and the surroundings are most admirably located for a naval training station, far better than San Diego. It would seem to me—and yet I profess to have no knowledge whatever upon the subject—that one naval station in California would be sufficient. To break it up, to divide it, to have the training station part of the time at San Francisco and part of the time at San Diego, would seem to me to be improper, and also expensive. May I ask the Senator the reason why there is a plan to break up or weaken the San Francisco naval training station?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator apparently was not paying attention to the speech that I made a moment ago in regard to it. The purpose of the committee is to accomplish the very thing that the Senator from Utah suggests—that is, to have only one training station on the Pacific coast. I agree with him in that. In some years past the question of whether or not that training station should have been developed at San Francisco might have been a practical question; but in recent years we have constructed at San Diego, at an expense of $2,000,000, permanent buildings for a training school for sailors, and in view of the policy of having only one training station on the Pacific coast it is intended to abandon the temporary building at San Francisco and concentrate the training activities at San Diego. We have not increased the appropriation in any way; but the suggestion I made a moment ago was that in the coming fiscal year there would be a period of transition between the two schools, moving from one place to the other, and in order to accommodate the appropriation to that situation I asked that both names be left in, not for the purpose of having two schools but to cover the period when they are moving from one place to the other.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator—and I did not gather this from his first statement—it is the purpose to abandon the school at San Francisco?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the intention, and that has been acted upon by Congress through a period of years.

Mr. KING. Of course, if, as the Senator stated, they have constructed buildings and a plant at San Diego costing $2,000,000 there may be wisdom in abandoning the school at San Francisco, but it would seem to me, in view of the considerable sum which was spent at San Francisco, and in view of the fact that the school had been there for many years, that it was not the wisest policy to expend $2,000,000 at San Diego. One would have supposed that the great San Francisco Bay, having, as I have indicated, a great fleet there, and the fullest opportunity to familiarize the students with all sorts of naval craft, would have been the ideal place for a naval training station, far better than at San Diego. However, if we are to have but one, I suppose the experts in the Navy have determined that San Diego is the place, and in view of the fact that we are to have but one, in which I concur, I shall not object to the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the committee amendment be rejected.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator what there is in the bill to indicate the abandonment of San Francisco, and that no funds will be expended at San Francisco.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing in the bill except the limitation on the appropriation, which would indicate it. It is impossible to conduct two training schools with the $125,000 that is carried in the bill.

Mr. KING. Of course, they would be permitted to divide the appropriation if they saw fit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not the intention of the department to divide it, but to move the school from one place to the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was, under "Naval Training Station, Rhode Island," on page 14, line 14, after the words "Rhode Island," to insert "(exclusive of Coddington Point)" and a colon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 5, to strike out "$125,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$225,000," so as to read:

In all, $225,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, before we continue with the discussion, in view of the fact that this is a matter of some moment, I make a point of no quorum, in order that more Senators may be present for the consideration of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	McKinley	Simmons
Broussard	Heflin	McNary	Smoot
Bursum	Hitchcock	Nelson	Spencer
Cameron	Johnson	Newberry	Swanson
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Townsend
Colt	Kellogg	Oddie	Trammell
Culberson	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Dial	King	Pepper	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	La Follette	Pittman	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Poindexter	Willis
France	Lodge	Pomerene
Gerry	McCormick	Ransdell
Glass	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, which the Secretary will again report.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, line 5, the committee proposes to strike out "$125,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$225,000."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee tell the Senate how the respective sums of $125,000 and $225,000 compare with the sum appropriated a year ago for the same purpose? The figures which have been supplied to me indicate that the appropriation for the training station at Newport last year was $185,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, at Newport there are a number of permanent buildings, thoroughly equipped, which have been utilized for years for housing a naval training school for apprentices in the Navy. In the management of this matter by the Navy Department that school has been abandoned during the past year.

Mr. McCORMICK. Did the Senator say "management"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I used the word "management." I might use the word "administration." The Senator can choose whatever word he likes as the more appropriate. It was considered by the committee that instead of developing a new training school, being put to the necessity of erecting a lot of new permanent buildings while these stand idle, to the extent to which those buildings are capable of accommodating a training school they should be used, and upon hearings before the committee the details of the cost of the maintenance of a training school there for 2,500 men, which the advisers of the committee said was the number which could be accommodated there, were worked out and the amount was fixed at the amount carried in the amendment—$225,000.

The $125,000 carried in the bill as it passed the House would practically have been a loss, appropriated for a school which was not being used, from which no results were being obtained. If we add $100,000 to it, we will get some benefit of the $125,000 which was carried in the bill as it passed the House and get a training school in operation. We do not increase the total of the appropriation at all, because we take off a similar sum from Hampton Roads, and through the broadmindedness, if I may use that expression, of the member of the committee from Virginia there was no objection to that adjustment between the two States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the appropriation for the naval training station at Newport this year, then, is $30,000 in excess of the sum appropriated for that purpose a year ago.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator will not overlook the point, in dwelling upon the comparison between the amount appropriated a year ago and the amount appropriated this year, what is really the controlling feature of this question, that under the appropriation a year ago there were no activities carried on at the school. I do not know what they did with the money, but there were no men being trained there. The committee proposes that there shall be 2,500 men trained there with this increased amount.

Mr. McCORMICK. Thirty thousand dollars more is appropriated this year for the training station at Newport, and if I am rightly informed $200,000 less is appropriated this year for the training station at Great Lakes, the only naval establishment accessible to the people of the States which lie between the watershed of the Alleghenies and those of the Rocky Mountains. Is that true?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is true. The question is whether that is the only training station in the interior?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is correct.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is an interesting coincidence that from Key West to Kittery Point the constituencies are dotted with ammunition dumps, guarded by companies of marines; torpedo schools; navy yards; and naval colleges. If I remember rightly, the State of North Carolina, among those States the shores of which are washed by the Atlantic, by some strange combination, has never been made the site of a naval establishment of any sort. I presume that it was the existence of the mint in North Carolina at one time which offset the development of a seafaring population at a naval base in that State.

The committee itself is, perhaps naturally, made up largely of seaboard Senators from these various States where the establishments are to be found. There are two Senators on the Naval Committee from seaboard States for every one from an interior State. I do not mean that they are willfully biased in their determination as to what ought to be done.

I submit, Mr. President, that for a great many years a large proportion of the enlisted personnel of the Navy have come from those interior States, whence the men would naturally go to the single interior training station.

Under the management, as the Senator said, of the Secretary of the Navy, who has sailed on the Henderson for Japan at the time this reorganization bill is under consideration by the Senate, apprentices for the Navy and newly enlisted men in the Marine Corps were being concentrated at Norfolk and Charleston. I share the view of the Senator from Washington that it was absurd, ludicrous, fantastic, if nothing worse, to abandon permanent buildings at Newport to concentrate apprentices in temporary buildings at Norfolk. The recommendation must have been approved at a time while the plans for the sailing of the class of 1881 preoccupied the department.

But I submit that if it would be absurd that youth from the North Atlantic States should be sent to Norfolk for their naval training, it is something more absurd to close the training station on the Great Lakes, built upon land given to the Government, and to make it necessary for the mothers and fathers of the young men from the inland States of Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin to go to Norfolk or to Newport to see their sons who have offered their services to the Navy.

There are some of us Senators from the inland States who, in the fulfillment of our judgment of what would serve the national interest, have supported measures looking to the maintenance of the American Navy and the reestablishment of the merchant marine, but I think it must be a very dull man who would imagine that he would enhance an understanding of the Navy and interest in the training of naval apprentices throughout the States of the upper Mississippi Valley by abandoning the only naval training station to which the sons of that country could go. I do not know how other Senators from the upper Mississippi Valley may feel, but I know for one that I am perfectly clear that if Secretary Denby or the Navy staff understand so little of human psychology that they think to arouse interest in the Navy by withdrawing from the interior the only station which embodies the Navy and makes it visible to the people of the interior, I can not agree with them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. For information I would like to ask the able Senator from Illinois, with whose remarks in the main I entirely agree, about what proportion of the recruits in peace times for naval service come from what might be denominated the interior States and what proportion come from the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific seaboard?

Mr. McCORMICK. If my memory serves me right, in the old days well-nigh half the enlisted personnel of the Navy came from the interior. I have been told within the last few days, by one of the officers attached to the Naval Establishment, that for some strange reason that proportion has seriously changed and that relatively few recruits are coming from the interior. None, as it happens, during the period of their apprenticeship are now stationed at the Great Lakes Station, where the mothers and fathers and sisters can go and see the young men during the period of their schooling.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the Senator that perhaps one reason for the greater number now coming from the seaboard arises from the fact that there have been numerous discharges from the Navy and from the Army, and perhaps many of them, not having sufficient funds to go home or having had a taste of sea or marine service, immediately reenlist and give their residence perhaps as of the seaboard State rather than the interior. But, without suggesting that as a reason to explain the situation just described, may I ask the Senator whether it is contended that the training obtained at the Great Lakes Station is inadequate or insufficient or is not as good as that which is obtained at Newport?

Mr. McCORMICK. I have never heard that alleged. The Senator knows, I think, that the training in the naval station is precedent to training at sea. It is not long since I stepped aboard a transport and was told by the commanding officer that half of the crew before the mast had never been to sea before. They were about to embark on their first voyage. At the naval training station, as the Senator knows from experience, the training is preliminary and precedent to the training which the enlisted man has at sea.

Mr. KING. That is my understanding. I was wondering if those who are such ardent advocates of having our training stations on the coast urged as a reason for it that they could not get adequate training at the Great Lakes Station.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have never heard that urged. If I am not mistaken the attempted abandonment—I was about to say destruction—of the large and permanent naval stations at Newport and the Great Lakes was determined by the present Secretary of the Navy, but upon whose recommendation I have not been told. It was he who ordered the concentration of all the apprentices in the temporary buildings at Norfolk. I have asked and shall presently receive, so I am advised, a list of the munition dumps and depots, torpedo schools, naval colleges, establishments, wireless schools, and other places for which appropriations are made in the bill.

I think that Senators who will study, for example, the report of the Marine Corps will be perfectly astonished by the distribution of marines, from Vladivostok, where there are 15, to Quantico, where there are 2,500. Any man who will study that report will ask himself if a joint committee ought not to be appointed to examine stringently into what has been called the management of the Navy. The Navy, militarily, is efficient. Nautically, it is efficient. Under the very able direction of Admiral McGowan the paymaster's service became very efficient. But I am beginning to doubt that that which would be called management, the efficient and economic disposition of its land establishments, is what the country in these days of retrenchment has a right to expect of every department.

I have nothing further to say on the amendment in line 5, but in conjunction with what I have said I shall have an amendment to offer in line 1 on page 16.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am sure the observations just made by the Senator from Illinois must have proven interesting as well as instructing to those Senators who had the opportunity to hear them. I think the Senator's criticisms of what might be denominated the business administration of the Navy are entirely warranted. I had occasion a few moments ago to say that the overhead expenses of the Navy were entirely too great. I called attention to the fact then very briefly that the appropriations, instead of being reduced to such limits as the American people had reason to believe they would be reduced to, had reached the stupendous sum of practically $300,000,000. The naval appropriation bill in 1903 was only $78,000,000; in 1904, $81,000,000; in 1905, $92,000,000; 1906, $100,000,000; 1907, 102,000,000; 1908, $98,000,000; 1909, $122,000,000; 1910, $136,000,000; 1911, $131,000,000; 1912, $126,000,000; 1913, $123,000,000; 1914, $140,000,000; 1915, $144,000,000; 1916, $149,000,000.

Then came the war, with, of course, the attendant increase in the naval and military expenditures, but even in 1917, when we were thrust so precipitately into the great World War, the naval expenses were only $313,000,000. In 1920 they were $616,000,000; in 1921, $433,000,000; for 1922 I have not the figures before me, but, as I recall, they were substantially $400,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, $300,000,000 is asked.

The Senator from Illinois has challenged attention to what I conceive to be an evil in the administration of the affairs of the Navy. I hope the Senator from Illinois will move at the appropriate places in the bill to strike out the appropriations for a number of so-called naval bases or stations, and the various schools and camps and stations.

They dot both the Atlantic and the Pacific coast. The Senator has indicated that there is only one State upon the Atlantic coast which has not obtained its share of the plunder.

It was said for many years that the river and harbor bills were framed by log-rolling activities upon the part of the representatives of the people, and that every little creek and rivulet in many of the States received large appropriations. I recall when I had the honor to serve in the House of Representatives, during the discussion of the river and harbor bill before the Committee of the Whole, a State—I shall not now designate it—was named by the Secretary, who was reading the bill. There were a number of items of appropriations for little creeks and streams, known and unknown, in that State, and the Representative who was sitting at my side, attracted by the reading of the name of his State, rose and said that he had never heard of a given stream which was receiving a very large appropriation; it was a small State, too. However, by the process of conciliation and log-rolling, these great appropriation bills, which in the aggregate have taken from the Treasury of the United States more than $1,000,000,000, have been passed.

Our public building bills have been drawn in the same way; and so we have scattered throughout the United States a large number of buildings in little towns. The Government of the United States has been compelled to pay for their erection, and is now being compelled to pay for their upkeep. So it has been with our Naval Establishment. This bill, carrying $300,000,000, is a revelation of the extravagance and the waste which have characterized the conduct of the Navy Department and which still persists and reflects itself in many of the items found in the bill. Instead of having a score or two score or perhaps a hundred stations of various kinds—I think the number will be a hundred—why not concentrate into a few, and thus reduce the tremendous and extravagant overhead of the Navy?

We hear a great deal about the economies of the present administration, and every few days we are told that the Budget has saved the country enormous sums. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the Budget as a reducer of expenses of the Government has proven utterly futile. The economies which have been effectuated have resulted from the action of the legislative branch of the Government. Much also is due to the splendid services of Representative MADDEN and much to the fine work of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and other members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate; but I think that the appropriations are still too great. Instead of keeping within our income, we are advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that the deficit for the fiscal year of 1922 will be approximately $500,000,000. I make bold to assert that when all of the deficiencies shall have been reported, and all of the appropriations made which will have to be provided in order to meet expenditures for the present year, the deficit will be over $600,000,000. It is already reported that the expenditures for 1922 will aggregate $2,831,479,212, plus $1,393,164,200, and those sums do not include any of the deficiency appropriations which have not yet been reported, although some of them may have been reported, but perhaps not yet acted upon. So, Mr. President, this administration, with the enormous income which is being derived from the heavy taxes which are placed upon the people, will have a deficiency of between five hundred and six hundred million dollars. What the deficiency will be next year no one can determine.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah is discussing a subject in which the whole country is interested, and that is the apparent inability of Congress to reduce expenditures. As I view the situation, the figures, as I have studied them, indicate that we have made very little progress, comparatively speaking, none at all. The country is naturally asking and everybody is asking what is the remedy? It is very clear to my mind that so long as we regard the party in power as being responsible for these expenditures we shall never make any progress. It does not make any difference which of the parties is in power, the expenditures continue to rise and taxes continue to increase. I do not say this to raise a partisan question but rather to obviate such a suggestion, for when we consider the expenditures which have been provided for up to this time it is apparent there is no party responsibility for them. Appropriations, many of which, I think, are intolerable and unjustifiable, have been supported from the other side of the Chamber just as eagerly as they have been supported from this side of the Chamber.

Now, so long, Mr. President, as that condition continues, and at the same time the impression is conveyed to the country that the particular administration or party in power is responsible for it, we are not getting the real facts of the situation to the country; and the abuse can not be corrected except through the power of public opinion. Let it be understood when the sum total is made up and the tremendous expenditures are known and the taxes continue to increase that it is not by reason of the action of one party but by reason of the action of both parties here in this Chamber. Neither side of the Chamber has any plan of economy, but both sides of the Chamber are always willing to swell appropriations whenever they have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho will acquit me of any partisanship in the discussion of appropriation bills. The Senator will recall that when the Democratic Party was in power perhaps I was more critical of the appropriations made by it than I have been of the appropriations carried in the bills reported by the present Republican majority, not because I thought the Democratic Party was more censurable than the Republican Party but because I felt that the Democratic Party, with its professions for economy, ought to know better and that it deserved more serious criticism than did the Republican Party. The Democratic Party has made greater professions of economy and efficiency of the administration than has the Republican Party, and I think the Democratic Party is more deserving of censure for extravagant appropriations, if they are made when that party is in power, than is the Republican Party, because the Democrats know better, they are pledged to economy, and they know when they are not economical and not efficient they are violating their platform and the principles upon which the Democratic Party rests.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Idaho that the record of the Democratic Party in the Senate and in the House is not free from criticism by any means upon the question of appropriations; upon these matters I would as quickly condemn my own party for what I regard as extravagance as I would condemn the Republican Party; but I want to say to my good friend from Idaho that the American people have not yet learned what economy is in governmental expenditures. As the Senator knows, we are whipped and spurred by our constituents and by the people throughout the United States to make appropriations upon every conceivable subject.

Mr. BORAH. By a very small portion of them. We get a telegram with reference to an appropriation for a particular part of the country; perhaps it represents a dozen men who are interested in the proposition; but the other several thousand we do not hear from, and to them we pay no attention. We legislate upon the call of a very small minority when it comes to the question of increasing appropriations. I have no doubt at all that the great mass of people are opposed to large appropriations, and that if the true voice of the people could be ascertained from the entire people it would be against them; but a few telegrams put us in action.

Mr. KING. There is very much in what the Senator says. The brave and courageous men in the Senate—and, of course, it would be unparliamentary for me to refer to those at the other end of the building, in the House of Representatives—are thrown into perturbation when telegrams and letters come demanding appropriations; but I invite the attention of the able Senator from Idaho to the fact that in our municipalities, in our political subdivisions, precincts, counties, school districts, and in our States there has been for the past 10 years a growing tendency toward extravagance and increased appropriations. If the Senator will now pick up the New York newspapers of to-day, or of any day, he will find there advertisements of various bond issues by political subdivisions, by States, by counties, and by school districts. The people seem to feel that they are warranted in bonding themselves and their inheritance and placing yokes and burdens upon their children and their children's children for many years to come.

I put into the RECORD some months ago figures showing the bonded indebtedness of the States and the municipalities and the counties in the United States. The sum is startling because of its magnitude. The bonded indebtedness of the United States, as the Senator knows, is approximately $24,000,000,000. I think there should be an educational campaign in the interest of public economy. We have not set the example here. The Senate has responded to the demands of executive departments, and the Senator knows that the voracity of the appetite of executives never can be appeased. I venture the assertion that as to the bill before us when the estimates were presented by the representatives of the Navy Department there were demands for two or three hundred million dollars more than are carried by the bill. The executive departments, no matter which party is in power, ask for more and still more; they are never satisfied, and would never be satisfied, no matter what appropriations might be made.

There is some sort of a malignant disease that takes possession of executive officials when they get into office. They want more power, and they want larger appropriations, and they want an extension of their authority; and Congress too freely, too liberally, too quickly responds to their demands, and so the appropriations increase by leaps and bounds. We will appropriate for the coming year perhaps nearly $4,000,000,000, and then there will be a deficit, and when the bonus bill is passed instead of its being four billions it will probably be six or seven or eight billions of dollars. So the expenses of the Government will increase, and we will proclaim our devotion to economy and to efficiency, but there will be none. It seems as if it were a hopeless task.

If the public will concern themselves in these appropriations, and will scourge the public servants, their Representatives in the House and their Senators, and demand of them economy, and threaten them with political annihilation unless there is economy, we may get it; and if we will curb the rapacity of executive officials, it will be a long step in the direction of economy.

I repeat, I hope that when we reach the appropriate places in the bill the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] will move to strike out the appropriations carried for a multitude of these useless and unnecessary bases for all sorts of things. We can prune this bill of fifty to seventy-five million dollars and leave an adequate amount for an efficient, a scientific, a modern, an up-to-date Navy, such as the American people will be proud of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The question is on the committee amendment on page 15, line 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 15, at the end of line 9, to strike out "$15,701.60" and to insert "$20,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $20,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I see no reason for this increase. The House allowed $15,701. I presume, however, it will be assigned as a sufficient reason that having increased the general amount from $125,000 to $225,000, there ought to be an increase here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this comes out of the other amount. It does not increase the total. This $20,000 is a part of what we have just passed on.

Mr. LODGE. It does not increase any appropriation.

Mr. KING. I understand that, but I am trying to limit the amount to be paid to civilian employees.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator no doubt has examined the bill carefully and is familiar with its provisions; and, if so, he will have noticed that corresponding to the increase of $5,000 on page 15 there is a decrease of $5,000 on page 16, so that it leaves the total exactly as it was before.

Mr. KING. Yes; but the point I had in mind, if the Senator will pardon me, is that all through this bill we find such large amounts, according to my view, devoted to clerical help, so much paid for overhead. These few thousands here—$5,000 in this place and $10,000 in another place, for clerks and overhead, and so on—in the aggregate make a very large sum. I think we ought to prune.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 16, line 1, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of the Great Lakes Naval Training Station from "$160,000" to "$200,000."

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$200,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$350,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by the committee, "$200,000," it is proposed to insert "$350,000."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that the increase made here is all that was asked for by the Navy Department and all that was asked for by the colleague of the Senator from Illinois in the amendment which he proposed before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCCORMICK. What was the item submitted by the Budget?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Was that asked by the department?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not in the hearings before the committee. I will read the Senator what was asked.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Presumably that was a figure which the Director of the Budget did not force on the department.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The testimony of Admiral Washington before the committee was that—

It is hardly practicable to get along with that amount—

That is, referring to the amount allowed by the House—and carry on the schools which we hope to carry on, namely, radio and aviation schools at Chicago.

The principal item is coal, and I think an increase of $40,000 over what the House allowed us would be sufficient to meet our needs.

So we added that $40,000 and made the total $200,000 upon the motion of the Senator's colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Illinois as to the amount that has been appropriated for a number of years past for the training station at Great Lakes?

Mr. MCCORMICK. Last year the amount was $400,000. This is $50,000 less than last year, whereas the amount proposed to be appropriated for Newport, and appropriated under the decision of the Senate, is $30,000 more than last year.

Mr. KING. While I concede that there is perhaps no proper basis for comparison, I should like to inquire of the Senator approximately the amount appropriated in 1915, 1916, and 1917 for naval training.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I am not able to tell the Senator. As he knows, the establishment has been very much enlarged since that time.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I am frank to say that if there is to be but one concentration of apprentices in this country, in view of the one hundred and some naval establishments running from Bremerton to Key West and from Key West to Kittery, I should think we in the interior might be given a glimpse of our common Navy at the Great Lakes Station.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. I understood him to say that this amount of $200,000 was appropriated because it was the amount asked for by the department. Is that correct?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I did not say it was appropriated because it was asked for, but I said that it was asked for and that the committee was of the opinion that it should be appropriated.

Mr. BORAH. What I meant to say was the committee conformed to their request?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. Of course, we considered the purpose for which it was asked. We went very carefully into the purpose for which it was to be used. There is a radio school there and an aviation school.

I may say, in regard to this naval training station at Great Lakes, that it is very largely the product of the war, like many other establishments that we are now trying to reduce.

This bill as it stands on the report of your committee carries $200,000, however, for this training school, as against $125,000 for the entire Pacific coast and $260,000 for Hampton Roads and $225,000 for Newport; and I fail to see any very great discrimination or discrepancy between those allowances.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator from Washington explain why, in his judgment, it is appropriate to increase the appropriation for Newport as compared with last year and to decrease that for Great Lakes?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Because of the fact that the increase of $100,000 at Newport was demonstrated to be necessary to operate the permanent buildings there.

Mr. McCORMICK. Are the buildings at Great Lakes any less permanent than those at Newport?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Much less permanent so far as a great number of them are concerned.

Mr. McCORMICK. How many men will the permanent buildings at Newport house, and how many men will the permanent buildings at Great Lakes house?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They will house a great many, but they will house 2,500 at Newport.

Mr. McCORMICK. How many at Great Lakes?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Probably equally as many.

Mr. McCORMICK. Why should there be the distinction?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am informed that the number of men estimated as capable of being housed in the permanent buildings at Great Lakes is 1,800. A radio school and an aviation school are being conducted there.

Mr. McCORMICK. How many men are there in those two schools now?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are 400 men there in those schools.

Mr. McCORMICK. There is room for 1,400 more men there, then. It is an interesting coincidence.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down, it does not seem to me that the true test here is whether or not this appropriation compares with that for Newport, but the question is, How much is really needed? According to the statement of the Senator from Washington, the committee has already appropriated all that could be used.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that if the Secretary of the Navy determines to keep these apprentices in the shacks at Norfolk, not a dollar of the increased appropriation will be needed at Newport. It may very well be that he will take that view, even though he has no high opinion of the judgment of the Senate. It will take approximately the sum of $350,000 if he orders to Great Lakes as many apprentices as it can comfortably house.

Mr. BORAH. I am willing to go back to Newport and keep down the amount to $125,000, but I am not willing, if we made a mistake on Newport, to make a second mistake on Great Lakes; and the question is not what we did with reference to Newport, but whether this increased amount is really needed at Great Lakes. As I understand, the Senator's colleague [Mr. McKINLEY] moved for this amount in the committee upon the hearings, and upon the motion of the Senator's colleague, based upon the evidence, the amount was made $200,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; and that presumed the abandonment of the apprentice school at Great Lakes. For one I am not willing to assent to the proposition that apprentice seamen enlisted in the interior shall all be ordered to Norfolk or Newport or San Diego. It would be just as sound and more sound to order the seaboard apprentices to the interior, in view of the establishments—one hundred and some—which are maintained from Bremerton to Key West, and from Key West to Newport, as I have said.

Mr. BORAH. I think if the boys had their choice they would likely want to go just as far away from their homes to get their education as they could. That is the general experience that we have.

Mr. McCORMICK. Of course there is an establishment at Vladivostok.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and I understand that we are maintaining it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been called for and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assisant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the negative). I find that my general pair, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], has not voted. So I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. DU PONT], and let my vote stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], and let my vote stand.

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] is detained on official business.

Mr. COLT. Has the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted?

Mr. COLT. In his absence, as I have a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. RAWSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and vote "nay."

Mr. KING. The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. Both Senators are necessarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bursum	Gooding	McKinley	Shortridge
Cameron	Harreld	McNary	Willis
Ernst	Johnson	Oddie
France	Lodge	Pomerene
Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Sheppard

NAYS—37.

Ashurst	Glass	Myers	Sutherland
Ball	Harris	Newberry	Swanson
Borah	Heflin	Overman	Townsend
Broussard	Hitchcock	Phipps	Underwood
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Kendrick	Poindexter	Warren
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Watson, Ind.

Elkins	Moses	Robinson	Williams
Fernald	Nelson	Shields
Fletcher	New	Simmons

So Mr. MCCORMICK'S amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 11, to reduce the appropriation for maintenance of Naval Training Station at Naval Operating Base, Virginia, Hampton Roads, Va., from "$360,000" to "$260,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, at the end of line 15, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve Force," on page 16, line 20, after the word "wharfage," to strike out "$50,000: Provided, That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent," and to insert, "pay and allowances of officers and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force, other than class 1, while on active duty for training; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from active duty for training; transportation of enrolled men to and from active duty for training, and subsistence and transfers en route or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enrolled men during the actual period of active duty for training; pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve Force and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve Force; and retainer pay of officers and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force, other than class 1, $3,000,000, which amount shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and transportation and for all expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve Force: Provided, That members of the Volunteer Naval Reserve may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be issued such articles of uniform as may be required for their drills and training, the value thereof to be charged against the clothing and small-stores fund: Provided further, That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent," so as to read:

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve Force and Naval Militia; for the maintenance and rental of armories, including the pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage, pay and allowances of officers and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force, etc.

Mr. BORAH. I would like to ask a question of the Senator having the bill in charge. I do not understand this amendment. Is it an increase in the appropriation over the House appropriation from $50,000 to $3,000,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is.

Mr. BORAH. I wish the Senator would explain the necessity for that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding is that the opinion of the framers of the bill in the House was that the matter of training the Naval Reserve ought to be left until such time as the entire establishment of the Naval Reserve was reorganized by new legislation, which will probably have to be done. It was thought by the Senate committee, however, that rather than forego entirely the training of the Naval Reserve in the coming fiscal year, which would be the result of following the policy just stated, we would make appropriations for that in this bill. The amount of $3,000,000 we considered a very modest amount for the purpose of training 10,000 enlisted men and 3,000 officers in the reserve.

Mr. KING. I would like a little further explanation from the Senator. Is there a general law which authorizes the course which this bill seems to prescribe?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is.

Mr. KING. What was the amount expended last year for this, and how many responded, both enlisted men and reserve officers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was no training last year at all.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that I have received three letters, one from an officer and two from men, claiming that this was a good deal of a farce. I express no opinion, because I do not know enough about it to justify me having an opinion. One officer who wrote me stated that it was just a holiday, that he had a delightful time. As I recall, he went a year or two ago, down on the Pacific somewhere, down toward Peru, and obtained very good compensation, as he stated, far more than he was receiving at home. He rather protested against it, and claimed that the Government was not receiving a quid quo pro.

It would seem to me that the greater part of this appropriation would be consumed in paying the traveling expenses of the enlisted men from the interior, or wherever they lived, to the boats and back home. May I inquire of the Senator how it operates and whether any good has resulted from the system?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is the judgment of most competent officers that the training of these men for periods of two weeks in naval discipline and naval instruction is of the utmost value. Men responding to this opportunity for training put themselves under obligation to be taken into the naval service of the country in case of emergency or in case of war, so that we create here, for comparatively small expense, a large force of partially trained men. Of course we can not train them completely in this short time.

I would not attach very much importance, I may say to the Senator from Utah, to the statement of an officer who took part in this training and then said that it did not amount to anything, that the Government was not getting anything out of it, but that he had a pleasant cruise. Any man who goes into it and does his duty will do a great deal more than that. He is bound to get some benefit for himself if he does the work outlined for him and obeys the orders given to him, or if he is an officer and gives proper instruction to the men under him. On the face of it, a comment of that kind from a man who served as an officer in the training of the Naval Reserve condemns its author and falls of its own weight, in my opinion.

We have had a great deal of experience with the matter, and it is the universal opinion of those who are capable of judging that very great benefit is derived from the training of the men.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator how many officers in any one year have availed themselves of this provision of the law, and also the highest number of men who have availed themselves of it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not able to give the Senator the figures as to all the previous years, but it is hoped and expected that there will be 3,000 officers and 10,000 men who will attend for training this year. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is scarcely any precedent of value in view of the fact that prior to the war the Naval Establishment, so far as ships and tonnage and men were concerned, was very small as compared with even that provided for in this bill; that during the war all of the activities of training of Naval Reserves were suspended, and that in the reorganization and reestablishment which has been going on since the war they have also been interrupted. So we are practically starting upon a new system, which will, as I said a moment ago, call for a revision of the law relating to the Naval Reserve and putting it, we hope, upon a more economical basis.

We carry a great many men now upon practically retired pay, which list is being constantly added to. It is one of those very liberal and generous provisions which came out of the spirit of generosity and liberality, if not extravagance, which characterized the people during the war and following the war. There will be need for revision of the law to come back to normal conditions.

Mr. KING. How much is paid to the officers and how much is paid to the men? I do not mean in the aggregate, but to each.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of the items of pay, the men and officers will receive $1,165,682. The mileage of officers will be $77,680. The active-duty ship keepers, $304,286; provisions for ship keepers, $109,500. Rent of armories, which is rather a misnomer, because we really have no armories and will have to acquire rooms where the men will meet and put on uniforms and undergo drill and where they can get some shelter, $250,000. There will be a small number of officers on active duty and there is $51,926 provided for them. For pay of all men for 17 days—that is, counting 15 days of actual training and a day going and a day coming—$715,000; for provisions for men during the period of training, $75,000; and for fuel for the operation of the ships upon which the training will be given, $250,000.

Mr. KING. That means practically, if I follow the Senator, that the officers get the major portion of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The officers get very little of it. I have not the segregated figures, but it is a mere matter of clerical computation. Pay of 3,000 officers during two weeks and pay of 10,000 men during the same period can easily be figured out. Each class of men will get what is allowed that class under the provisions of the pay law which was recently enacted by Congress.

Mr. KING. The Senator gave an item of one million several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was for officers and men, retainer pay—one month's retainer pay for officers and men.

Mr. KING. Then the men receive, in addition to the $715,000 for 17 days' pay, retainer pay for one month?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KING. And the officers receive retainer pay for one month?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. KING. And then pay for 17 days?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. Of course, the retainer pay is fixed by law for the various classes of the naval reserves. The purpose of it is to compensate men for putting themselves under the obligation of responding to the call of the country in case of an emergency or in case of war.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether that retainer pay is given to the men prior to or after the service of 17 days, because if we pay in advance we may not get the 17 days' service.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What was the Senator's question?

Mr. KING. Is the retainer pay of one month given to the man in advance of the actual 17 days' service?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. It is given to him only when he responds and volunteers for the service.

Mr. KING. There is no question about that, I understand?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no question about it.

Mr. KING. And they draw the same compensation as if they were in the Navy? If they bear the grade of captain or admiral, they get a month and 17 days' pay of a captain or admiral or whatever rank they may hold?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. I imagine there will be no admirals and probably very few captains, but whatever rank or grade they occupy, they will get one month's pay as a retainer and in addition to that will get 17 days' pay of the grade which they hold.

Mr. KING. Then the proposition is simply, as I understand it, that 10,000 men and more than 1,000 officers are to be paid, under existing law—and this bill carries the appropriation—one month's compensation each year and compensation for 17 days' service, for the 17 days they are absent from their homes. In other words, to get them to give 17 days' service each year we pay them for the 17 days and in addition to that one month's compensation. It may be worth it, but I confess I am not able to perceive it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask one more question of the Senator from Washington. He may have answered it, but I did not hear it. What reason was assigned by the House for not putting this item in the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The reason was that the law relating to the Naval Reserve will soon be revised and there ought to be a general revision, and they preferred to wait and have a special appropriation bill for the training of the Naval Reserve. The only difference of opinion in that respect between the Senate committee and the House committee is that the Senate committee recommends that the appropriation be made in this bill, notwithstanding the prospective revision of the Naval Reserve act.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator to put this item over until to-morrow and give me a chance to examine into it a little further. If we take a vote now I may be compelled to move to reconsider. I have no objection to taking a vote on it now, if the Senator will consent to permit a motion to reconsider to-morrow in the event I desire to reopen the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was in hopes that we might go on with the matter and dispose of it.

Mr. KING. I have no objection. I merely ask that the vote on this particular item may go over until to-morrow, or, if the Senator desires to take a vote now, that I may make a motion to-morrow to reconsider if I shall be so advised.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That will be entirely satisfactory. Let us take the vote, and then, if the Senator desires to reopen it, he can make his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington with respect to the item providing for "Naval War College, Rhode Island"? It is not subject to amendment under the present method of procedure; but what is the necessity of maintaining the Naval War College there or of making this appropriation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Naval War College at Newport has been established for a number of years and is regarded by a great many men, such as Admiral Sims, for instance, who is at the head of it at the present time, as the most valuable institution in the Navy. It is the only school in the Navy which trains officers in the art of war. The purpose of it is to give a post-graduate course to officers of the Navy in the strategy and tactics of naval campaigns and battles. There will be found there taking this course commanders and admirals. The college at Newport is regarded as having proved its usefulness by the interest which it has created among the officers of the Navy and by the improvement which they have received from the course which they have there taken.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I concede the wisdom and the propriety of having such a post-graduate school, but it occurred to me that we have the War College here at Washington, as the Senator knows, and, though its functions are somewhat different, it might be amplified to embrace the work of the institution at Newport——

Mr. POINDEXTER. That has been suggested.

Mr. KING. And thereby save the expense of having another college in some other place. The most expert men are here at the War College; they are up to date on all modern naval warfare and its technique; and it occurred to me that it would be better to concentrate and have one splendid naval war college.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But, of course, the War College here relates to warfare on land.

Mr. LODGE. The War College here has to do with the Army.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, the War College at Newport is a naval war college, while the War College here in Washington is an Army war college. The War College in Newport has been established, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has stated, for a great many years. The officers who undergo instruction there pursue a course of intensive study. I do not know whether the Senator from Utah has ever seen the war games, but the officers at Newport work out maneuvers on a board and then try them out practically with the fleet. It has really been a great source of strategic naval devolopment.

Apart from that, the college at Newport is utilized to its full capacity, as I think the War College is in Washington; and it would really be an additional expense, even supposing that it were a practical proposition, to try to enlarge the War College here and to do away with the Naval College at Newport, where all necessary facilities have been provided. If the idea of the Senator from Utah is one of economy, I feel sure he is going in the opposite direction if he advocates the abandonment of the Naval War College at Newport.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Naval Observatory, salaries, Navy Department," on page 23, line 11, before the word "two," to strike out "two at $1,400 each" and insert "one $1,400," so as to read:

Astronomers—1 $3,200, 1 $2,800; assistant astronomers—1 $2,400, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800; assistant in department of nautical instruments, $1,600; clerks—chief $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate very briefly in regard to the amendments proposed by the committee reducing the number of employees provided by the House bill for the Naval Observatory and the Nautical Almanac. The provisions made by the House are very moderate. The Nautical Almanac and the Naval Observatory perform a service of the very highest value. They are engaged in activities which are essential, and they are as free from overhead expenses, to which my friend from Utah [Mr. KING] is fond of objecting, as are any institutions of which I know in the Navy or in any other department of the Government. I have therefore secured some facts in regard to these two adjuncts to the naval service which I wish to lay briefly before the Senate.

Mr. KING. To what specific item is the Senator from Massachusetts referring?

Mr. LODGE. I am referring to the amendments reported by the committee affecting the Naval Observatory and the Nautical Almanac. I am going to consider them both together. In my judgment, there ought to be no reduction in the appropriations for either the Naval Observatory or the Nautical Almanac below those provided by the House. The economies that are proposed to be effectuated by the amendments of the Senate committee are trifling, while the work which these two great organizations perform is absolutely vital to the naval service; and it is performed at a lower rate of cost than similar work is performed at the observatory at Greenwich or at any other foreign observatory. I may add also that a larger amount of work is done.

The first amendment to which I desire to call attention is, on page 23, line 11, where the committee propose to reduce the number of clerks at $1,400 in the Naval Observatory from two to one. From the statement which has been furnished to me it appears that—this clerk is needed to keep up with current work in the material business of the Bureau of Navigation which is done at the observatory. The effective number of clerks has not been increased over the 1915 standard, because then two clerks were borrowed from other branches and enlisted clerical force was available. They did not show on this appropriation. This arrangement is no longer permitted. Business has much increased since 1915.

It seems that they have dispensed with some of the clerical assistance in that particular office; and I do not think there ought to be any further reduction.

The next amendment to which I desire to refer is on page 23, line 13, which proposes to reduce the number of assistants from three at $1,600 each to two at $1,600 each, and from three at $1,400 each to two at $1,400 each, a reduction of one in each class.

These "assistants" are astronomers in the making. The cut results in taking off one observer (who also does high-class computing) from each of two principal astronomical instruments. These men represent a considerable Government investment in the years of training they have received here for the work needed. Or else the $1,600 cut results in removing the acting head of the computing division, to whom the same statement applies. None can be spared.

On page 23, line 16, one fireman is eliminated, the number being reduced from four to three; the number of watchmen is reduced from seven to five, and the number of laborers from eight to six. In connection with this proposed reduction the statement to which I have heretofore referred says:

There are now four firemen. Out of 46 buildings scattered over 62 acres, 18 buildings are heated by the central plant. These men handle coal, look after pumps, boilers, piping, plumbing, etc., and also run motor lawn mowers. The Government allows each 30 days' leave a year, and more if he gets sick. Under these conditions three firemen as a total can not do the work, and with only three allowed it is not possible to obtain reliable men at the low wage offered.

Similar reasons apply to the need for the present seven watchmen. The guarding of separate buildings containing astronomical apparatus, and valuable stocks of navigational instruments, from fire and theft, the work by night adjusting shutters to instrument houses, etc., and attendance at the telephone switchboard can not be adequately done under the reduction. Nor can the reduced number of laborers accomplish the necessary upkeep efficiently.

On page 23, line 22, the item of $5,000 for miscellaneous computations in astronomy is stricken out.

"Miscellaneous computations" covers the pay of four to five computers, whose duty is to do the routine computing resulting from the observations made on the various instruments.

Of course, without the necessary computations the observations are valueless—

One (and sometimes two, as occasion demands) computes for the chronometer and time service. The higher class of computation work is done by the observers. The miscellaneous computation fund has remained stationary at $5,000 since 1915 but covers less work than at that time, due to the impossibility now of obtaining workers at the 1915 rate of wages. The deprivation of this $5,000 so slows the results obtainable from the observations as to throw the work seriously in arrears. Moreover, it removes the source of supply for juniors who act as assistants in the time service and at the instruments to fill temporary vacancies, and who must be relied on to fill the higher places later in life. The restoration of the sum for miscellaneous computations is vital to the production of astronomical results.

The amendments propose a cut of 30 per cent in the department of observations (astronomical), and the number at present employed is fewer than the work demands. The table shows the totals.

I ask to have the table printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

	1915	1922	Proposed by amendments.
Professors of mathematics (U. S. Navy)	2	2	2
Astronomers		2	2
Assistant astronomers	3	3	3
Assistants	8	6	4
Miscellaneous computers	5	4
Time service		1	1
Librarian	1	1	1
Total	19	19	13

Mr. LODGE. As to the amendment on page 24, line 18, which reduces from $6,500 to $5,000 the appropriation "for cleaning, repair, and upkeep of grounds and roads," the following statement is made:

The Naval Observatory grounds are maintained as a park in the city of Washington. The roads are mostly for public use. Some are thoroughfares. Whether they can be satisfactorily maintained a credit to the Government for a less sum than hitherto remains to be proved. The larger sum is recommended.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to describe briefly the work of the Naval Observatory. I presume all Senators have seen it:

The Naval Observatory is a large and expensive plant in which the Government has a heavy investment. The purpose for which it was established is best served by utilizing a sufficient personnel to carry on the work efficiently. A less personnel causes, for the sake of a small assumed economy, a definite loss on the investment.

I ask the attention of the Senate to the following statement:

The product of the Naval Observatory is:

(a) Time signals.

(b) The Nautical Almanac (salaries in another special appropriation).

(c) Astronomical observations for position of heavenly bodies (used for time signals, for Nautical Almanac, and for scientific investigations).

(d) Navigation instruments for naval vessels and aircraft.

Such instruments are cared for and regulated at the observatory.

The time for the United States comes from the Naval Observatory. With time signals twice daily, by cooperation of the Naval Radio Service, the observatory is in communication with every naval vessel at sea in the Atlantic and also with thousands of merchant vessels. It gives them that exact time without which they can not safely navigate and without which, in war, location of rendezvous at sea would be impossible. By cooperation of the telegraph companies the time is flashed across the land at noon, and is of inestimable value to science, commerce, and the industries. This time service is acknowledged abroad to be among the best. Australia has used these time signals to determine State boundaries in longitude.

To insure the requisite accuracy in nautical almanacs requires continuous and numerous astronomical observations of the sun, moon, planets, and stars. This astronomy of position is the main business of the department of observations at the Naval Observatory and of a few observatories of other governments. The Naval Observatory carries on continuously the heavy and tedious labor of determining the accurate positions of the heavenly bodies and the fundamental astronomical constants upon which all investigations in astronomy depend. This is not work usually done by other than government observatories. The amount of such work now being done in the world is insufficient for astronomical needs. The quota expected from the United States should not be diminished.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the following comparison between the United States Naval Observatory and the Greenwich Observatory, England:

In the year 1920—the latest official data available—comparison with Greenwich Observatory, England, shows 16 observers and 14 computers there, the Naval Observatory at Washington having only 12 observers and 6 computers. Comparison of cost and output shows efficiency and economy. The meridian circle is one of the important instruments in astronomy of position. In 1920 Greenwich made 9,735 observations and the Naval Observatory 9,601. There are nine important astronomical instruments in operation at the Naval Observatory.

I shall not weary the Senate by reading the remainder of the description of the work of the observatory, but I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The star places now in use for the determination of time, longitude, and latitude are based on observations made 25 and more years ago. This observatory, as well as others, has a large amount of material available for the improvement of the star places. Such an improvement is being demanded constantly by astronomers, by the requirements of the time signals, and by survey work. Any curtailment of the present force of the observatory and almanac hinders the observatory in meeting the present demands for better modern star places, data which it is its distinct province to furnish. In other words, the data which the observatory will accumulate as one of the results of its observations from now on for the next 25 years will be the foundation for the next set of star catalogues. If the observations cease, this country will have no data available at that time and other sources of information must be sought.

A single program of astronomical work often takes many years to carry out. The kind of work done at the Naval Observatory requires a larger number of employees than the kinds of work done in many astronomical observatories. It is a difficult matter to recruit such personnel, as there are comparatively few to select from. The experience and training of these employees represent a considerable expenditure on the part of the Government. They are of recognized standing among the scientific men of the country and are well qualified to reflect credit upon the observatory and to efficiently and capably make the contributions which the world expects this Government to make to this important utilitarian branch of astronomy. They are underpaid, as can be seen from the Government scheme of reclassification.

The rating of chronometers and timepieces for naval vessels and aircraft and the repair and development of navigational instruments done at the Naval Observatory is correlated with the astronomical work. It is in the interest of economy to utilize the facilities and the talent there provided, and a large saving of costs results.

The administration of the material business of the Bureau of Navigation is handled at the Naval Observatory. Such material runs from a $30,000 gyro compass installation in a dreadnaught to a toy balloon for measuring air currents. Timepieces, sextants, binoculars, and other portable instruments are held in reserve stock here. The clerical and storekeeping work is voluminous.

The foregoing is a general description of the principal work carried on in this establishment. Many of the activities attract little notice despite their essential value, and some are not well understood without close study. Visitors and inquirers are welcomed at the Naval Obervatory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the principal business of the Naval Observatory of the United States is the "astronomy of position," as it is called. It is strictly utilitarian. Of course, great discoveries have been made there; but the activities of the observatory are not purely scientific; they are eminently utilitarian. The work of the observatory is of the greatest possible service to every railroad, to every merchant vessel, to every naval vessel, and to all the business of the world. I ask to print at this point a list of apparatus, and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

A list of the principal astronomical apparatus and the principal work of each instrument is appended.

WORK ASSIGNED TO ASTRONOMICAL INSTRUMENTS AT THE UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Twenty-six-inch equatorial (Professor Hall and Mr. Bower): Observations of satellites of the planets for improving the tables given in the American Ephemeris and for determining the masses of the planets for improving the planetary tables. Occultations of stars by the moon for improving the lunar tables. Eclipses of Jupiter's satellites for testing uniformity of the earth's rotation period. Observations of asteroids and comets for determination of orbits.

Twelve-inch equatorial (Professor Hall, Mr. Peters, and Mr. Bower): Observations of bright comets and asteroids and occultations of stars by the visitors on the regular visitors' night.

Photographic equatorial (Mr. Peters): Observations of asteroids in a selected zone, for the purpose of keeping track of these objects and to furnish positions for improved orbits.

Photoheliograph (Mr. Peters): Daily photographs of the sun near noon for recording the sun spots and studying their relation to magnetic phenomena, electric storms, and auroras, including disturbances affecting telegraph and cable lines. The Western Union Telegraph Co. and Bureau of Engineering of the Navy Department are cooperating in this work. Telegraph and cable companies depend on results here to know when to take precautions against heavy induced currents, thus saving damage and expense due to destruction of their cables.

Six-inch transit circle (Mr. Hammond and Mr. Watts): Observations of standard stars, sun, Venus, and Mercury for the purpose of improving their positions—a series of approximately 50,000 observations extending over eight years is now completed. Its reduction is approaching completion and will soon be ready for publication. Determinations of time for the use of the time service in sending out daily time signals.

Nine-inch transit circle (Mr. Morgan, Mr. Burton, Mr. Pawling, and Mr. Raynsford): Observations of intermediary stars by which reference stars to be used in reducing photographic plates are to be determined, and in connection with this observation of standard stars, sun, moon, and planets. Present program was begun in 1913 and will be completed in two years.

Prime vertical (Mr. Hill): Observations of transits over the prime vertical for the determination of the nutation constant, the aberration constant, the variation of latitude; also the declinations of certain stars with especial reference to determining their proper motions. A series of observations extending over 19 years is completed and the results will soon be ready for publication.

Photographic zenith tube (Professor Littell, Mr. Wise, and Mr. Willis): Observations of stars very near the zenith for determining the variation of latitude and the constant of aberration of light. The variation of latitude, as determined by this instrument, is necessary for the reduction of observations made with the transit circles at this observatory. The observations for variation of latitude should be carried on continuously at this place.

Alt-azimuth (Professor Littell and Mr. Wise): Observations of standard stars and the sun for the improvement of their declinations. Long job, 10 years (2 years done).

Mr. LODGE. I think work of the character of that performed by the Naval Observatory ought to be done in the most efficient and accurate manner. It is done now with a higher degree of efficiency and at a lower cost than in any of the other observatories for which I have been able to obtain figures. I have taken, of course, Greenwich as the most famous observatory in the world.

I wish now to say a word about the Nautical Almanac Office. It is proposed in that case to strike out some of the assistants and greatly to reduce the very moderate amounts given by the House.

The duties of the Nautical Almanac Office are twofold: The publication of the annual volumes of the American Ephemeris—which gives the positions of the planets and is absolutely essential to navigation—and the Nautical Almanac, which, of course, as its name implies, is equally essential to every man who goes to sea. The safety of navigation depends on these publications.

The American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac must be published and distributed prior to the beginning of the year to the navigators of ships, surveyors, and astronomers, in whatever part of the world they may be. This book is now a volume of 800 pages, 30 per cent larger than a few years ago.

Here is a point which I think the committee must have overlooked, and that is the agreement we have made with other nations to carry on this work.

Congress in 1912 authorized the exchange of data with foreign almanac offices—

With a view to reducing the amount of duplication of work in preparing the different national nautical and astronomical almanacs and increasing the total data which may be of use to navigators and astronomers available for publication in the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac.

A proviso was adopted providing for the employment of certain men in that work.

The arrangement thus authorized has been entered into with Great Britain, France, Germany, and Spain. It should be noticed that this arrangement had for its purpose increasing the information available for navigators and astronomers without increasing the expenses of the various national almanac offices. Any cut in the force immediately curtails the work that can be done in improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars.

I think to economize on an international agreement of that kind is not only very poor economy indeed—for the amounts are trifling—but it is not living up to our agreements. I think we ought to live up to our agreements of that kind with other nations from whom we are receiving very valuable information. In short, Mr. President, I confess that I am surprised by, and I greatly regret, the amendments made by the Senate committee in regard to the Observatory and the Nautical Almanac Office. They are run with the utmost economy now. I am satisfied of that; in fact, it is demonstrated by the fact that the House accepted these amounts. They are run with great efficiency. To that I can testify from years of knowledge in regard to the work; and I wish very much the committee would be willing to consider those reductions again before taking a final vote.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator there that he might call the attention of the committee to the expense to which the Government has been put for carrying on this work for the last number of years.

From 1883 to 1915 it appears that there were 10 persons employed, with appropriations of from $6,000 to $8,600 for piecework.

From 1916 to 1920 there were 12 persons employed, with only $3,000 appropriated for piecework.

From 1921 to 1922 there were only 11 persons employed, with $1,500 for piecework.

Now the committee proposes to cut this down about a third more.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator put in those figures. They are very illustrative. They show that there have been no increases here.

Mr. DIAL. The cut now is to a point about a third under the lowest amount there has been.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. The amount now is the smallest amount that has been appropriated in a generation for this great work.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and the work is of such enormous importance, not only to the Navy—because there they take care, as I have said, of all the naval instruments, and regulate all the chronometers—but the observations and information furnished by the Nautical Almanac are the sailing directions of all our commerce, and are largely used by other nations. There are very few departments of work undertaken by the Government which have the general value that the Naval Observatory and the Nautical Almanac have to the business and commerce of the world.

There are few Senators present, and nobody has paid much attention to what I have been saying. That, no doubt, is my fault. I have not said it in a sufficiently fascinating way, I suppose; but I should like to appeal to the committee to let this matter go over and consider it a little further before they make these cuts, which are really trivial in comparison to the great sums which we are appropriating here—very properly, I think, for I am thoroughly in favor of the bill, and of all that we have done—but I dislike exceedingly to see these cuts voted. No increase is asked for. These are all reductions of the House appropriations. The total amount involved is very small, and it is reducing the appropriations for one of the most important branches of our Government service.

In connection with the amendments concerning the Nautical Almanac and American Ephemeris, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an official statement from the Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NAVAL OBSERVATORY, June 13, 1922.

STATEMENT CONCERNING PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO NAUTICAL ALMANAC APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1923.

H. R. 11228 (Rept. No. 762), in the Senate, April 20, 1922. (See pp. 24, 25.)

The following amendments are proposed by the Senate Appropriations Committee to the appropriations for the Nautical Almanac Office carried in the Navy Department appropriation bill as reported to the Senate June 10, 1922:

Strike out "one assistant at $1,400, two assistants at $1,200; for pay of computers on piecework, $1,500." This is a cut of 33⅓ per cent in personnel.

The present civilian force of the office is 11 assistants, with the addition represented by $1,500 for piecework. The present force is the result of reductions of 15 per cent made two years ago in the interest of efficiency and economy. The force is now less than it has been for a generation.

The table shows the force appropriated for in the Nautical Almanac Office for past years:

	1883-1915	1916-1920	1921-22
Number of assistants	10	12	11
Allotment for pieceworkers	$5,000-$8,600	$3,000	$1,500
Equivalent total expressed in terms of number of assistants	15	14	12

The present force is under the supervision and direction of a professor of mathematics (United States Navy), who is a theoretical and practical astronomer of ability and long experience.

The cuts in personnel contemplated will reduce the product of the Nautical Almanac Office to a damaging extent and injure the usefulness of the office and its international repute.

The duties of the almanac office are twofold—the publication of the annual volumes of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, and improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars which are used in preparing the annual volumes.

The American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac must be published and distributed prior to the beginning of the year to the navigators of ships, surveyors, and astronomers in whatever part of the world they may be. This book is now a volume of 800 pages—30 per cent larger than a few years ago.

On August 22, 1912, Congress authorized the exchange of data with foreign almanac offices—

"With a view to reducing the amount of duplication of work in preparing the different national nautical and astronomical almanacs and increasing the total data which may be of use to navigators and astronomers available for publication in the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac"—

with the proviso—

"That any employee of the Nautical Almanac Office who may be authorized in any annual appropriation bill and whose services in whole or in part can be spared from the duty of preparing for publication the annual volumes of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac may be employed by said office in the duty of improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars."

The arrangement thus authorized has been entered into with Great Britain, France, Germany, and Spain. It should be noticed that this arrangement had for its purpose increasing the information available for navigators and astronomers without increasing the expenses of the various national almanac offices. Any cut in the force immediately curtails the work that can be done in improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars.

Thus to use this international arrangement to economize on the working force, thus reducing the promised results, may be open to the criticism of not living up to our agreement with the foreign national offices.

Moreover, a large part of the data in the Ephemeris can not be computed until that in other parts are finished. Much of the data furnished to the foreign offices by the American office is of this nature and must await the receipt of data apportioned to be furnished from abroad. When these data are received, it is necessary for several months to put the entire present force of this office to work preparing the data to be sent abroad. A reduced force would be unable to prepare the data in time for publication.

Most of the foreign almanacs, as well as our own, obtain their data pertaining to the sun, planets, and stars from the tables prepared in the American Nautical Almanac Office.

The star places, now in use, for the determination of time, longitude, and latitude, are based on observations made 25 and more years ago. An improvement of these places is being demanded by astronomers, by the requirements of the time signals, and by survey work. This work of revision is now being carried on in the Nautical Almanac Office.

It is earnestly urged that the appropriations for the Nautical Almanac Office for the year 1923 be restored to the form in which they were when the bill passed the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the committee agree with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the importance of the work done at the Naval Observatory and in the Nautical Almanac Office in the preparation of the American Ephemeris; but upon the most complete information that was submitted to the committee which considered the bill they could not resist the conclusion that there are quite a number of supernumeraries employed in this establishment, which has grown up through a long period of years, some of these places being more or less sinecures. It is perhaps unavoidable that they should be so. When Senators look over the classes of employees, and consider the number of them, and see the reductions that have been made by the committee, it would be difficult, it seems to me, for anyone, even upon the very face of the provision, if he knew what this establishment was, to resist the conclusion that the reductions which have been made here will not interfere in the slightest degree with the conduct of this work.

For instance, the bill provides an astronomer, an assistant astronomer, two other assistant astronomers, an assistant in the department of nautical instruments, a chief clerk at $2,000, a clerk at $1,800, another clerk at $1,600, two clerks at $1,200, an instrument maker at $1,500, an electrician at $1,500, a librarian at $1,800, a stenographer and typewriter at $900, a foreman and captain of the watch at $1,000, a carpenter, an engineer, and a mechanic. Those have not been interfered with at all. All those places have been left just as provided in the House bill. In addition to those, the House bill carried two clerks at $1,400 each, three assistants at $1,600 each, and three at $1,400 each. The only change that the committee has made is in allowing one clerk instead of two at $1,400, two assistants instead of three at $1,600, and two instead of three at $1,400, reducing the total amount from $56,400 to $48,520.

As to the Nautical Almanac, the bill as it came from the House provided for one assistant in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac at $2,500, one at $2,000, two at $1,800 each, two at $1,600 each, two at $1,400 each, and three at $1,200 each. The committee has left all of those, except that it has provided for one at $1,400 instead of two, and one at $1,200 instead of three, making a reduction from $18,420 to $14,620. We are informed by competent evidence that the work of preparing the Nautical Almanac and the American Ephemeris can be done just as competently with a reduced force as it can with those carried in the House bill, which is merely a formal matter brought over from the old establishment and the old appropriation from year to year; simply nobody has paid any attention to it or examined whether or not there were more people there than were necessary.

Of course, wherever you undertake to reduce a force you are going to meet with objection; it does not make any difference where it is. The persons who hold those positions will find some one to champion their cause, and, of course, we sympathize with them; but if they are competent men I judge there will be no difficulty in their finding places somewhere else. For instance, where they have four firemen in the Naval Observatory, we reduce them to three. The fireman who loses his job no doubt can be taken care of somewhere else.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator on that particular point that that does not require scientific knowledge, although I think I know something about the value of the work done there. Here are 46 buildings and 62 acres. These four firemen have charge of the heating apparatus, which supplies, I think, 18 buildings, and they do a great deal of other work, plumbing, and so forth, which would have to be done outside if they were not there. For 46 buildings and 62 acres to be covered by 7 watchmen and 4 firemen does not seem to me excessive. I know perfectly well that I could not do it if I had 46 buildings to take care of. The result is that the buildings are not properly taken care of; then more money has to be spent in repairing them and in guarding them.

It seems to me that that is exceedingly moderate for such a large estate as that is; but, of course, that is not vital, I admit. You can go with shabby grounds and buildings out of repair and run the risk of fire and all that if you choose, but the work of the Nautical Almanac and the work of the Naval Observatory is essential, in my judgment, to the proper conduct not merely of the Navy but of all the railroads and all the ships that sail the seas, in which the United States is interested, and to the regulation of the chronometers on which the safety of those ships depends.

I have known a good deal about the observatory in past years. Nobody who is losing a place has been near me, let me say, but I have always taken an interest in the observatory, and I know it has not been a place for sinecures. On the contrary, they are a very hard-worked body of men, who have done a great deal of good work, and the test is in a comparison with Greenwich. With fewer men, they have made more observations and done more work, and I say that to cut down $12,000 altogether in such an important matter as this is following a mistaken policy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We should not overlook the fact that in addition to the five watchmen who are to be retained under the Senate committee amendment there is a captain of the watch, so that if the Senate committee amendment is adopted we would have a captain of the watch and five watchmen.

Mr. LODGE. It is very difficult to get first-rate men at the Government rates of wages, but if the Senator thinks that the place can be properly guarded with the watchmen and laborers allowed, and that the provision carried in the bill will insure the safety of the buildings and the care of the property, which is of very great value, which cost great sums of money, I am not disposed to dispute his judgment, but I think it most unfortunate to cut down, particularly in the matter of the Nautical Almanac and the American Ephemeris. To make these petty economies in this particular department of the Government does not seem to me to be right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROUSSARD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 23, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 23, line 10, the committee proposes to strike out "two at $1,400 each" and insert in lieu thereof "one, $1,400" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I shall not ask for a roll call now, for I want to get the bill through, but when it gets into the Senate, when I hope we shall have a better attendance, I shall ask for a record vote on these reductions.

The next amendment was, on page 23, in line 13, after the word "assistants," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; in the same line, before the words "at $1,400 each," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; in line 16, before the word "firemen," to strike out "four" and insert "three"; in the same line, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "seven" and insert "five"; in line 17, before the word "laborers," to strike out "eight" and insert "six"; and in line 18, to strike out "$56,400" and insert "$48,520"; so as to make the paragraph read:

Astronomers—one $3,200, one $2,800; assistant astronomers—one $2,400, one $2,000, one $1,800; assistant in department of nautical instruments, $1,600; clerks—chief $2,000, one $1,800, one $1,600, one $1,400, two at $1,200 each; instrument maker, $1,500; electrician, $1,500; librarian, $1,800; assistants—two at $1,600 each, two at $1,400 each; stenographer and typewriter, $900; foreman and captain of the watch, $1,000; carpenter, $1,000; engineer, $1,200; three firemen, at $720 each; five watchmen, at $720 each; mechanic, $900; six laborers, at $660 each; in all, $48,520.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses, Naval Observatory," on page 23, line 21, to strike out "For miscellaneous computations, $5,000."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on that particular proposition I do wish to make a protest of the strongest kind. It is absolutely cutting down the work of the observatory. It is not getting rid of men; it is cutting off the work of the observatory, work which the observatory is established to do. If we do not have this appropriation for computations, the observations are valueless, and that is what the whole institution exists for. To cut off $5,000 for miscellaneous computations is simply arresting and stopping the work of the observatory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the committee is informed that the work can be done by the force available there under the Senate committee amendment, but if it should appear in conference that that is not the case the committee would be very glad to restore it.

Mr. LODGE. I got my figures from the head of the observatory, who is not affected by a single appropriation here, as he is an officer of the Navy, in charge of the observatory. I have talked with no one else, but I know enough about their work to know that cutting off the appropriation for computations is cutting off their right hand. I should like to know who it is who says that the work is not important, and that it can be done without this appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STERLING. Making the same announcement as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Sterling
Borah	Gerry	McKinley	Sutherland
Cameron	Glass	Newberry	Townsend
Capper	Harris	Overman	Wadsworth
Caraway	Heflin	Owen	Warren
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Dillingham	King	Poindexter
Edge	Ladd	Smoot
Ernst	La Follette	Spencer

NAYS—16.

Broussard	Johnson	McNary	Sheppard
Bursum	Lodge	Pepper	Underwood
Dial	McCormick	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
France	McCumber	Ransdell	Willis

NOT VOTING—47.

Ashurst	Hale	Nelson	Shortridge
Brandegee	Harreld	New	Simmons
Calder	Harrison	Nicholson	Smith
Colt	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Stanfield
Crow	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Stanley

Elkins	McKellar	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	McLean	Reed	Weller
Fletcher	Moses	Robinson	Williams
Gooding	Myers	Shields

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the Naval Observatory, on page 24, line 18, to reduce the appropriation for cleaning, repair, and upkeep of grounds and roads from "$6,500" to "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries, Nautical Almanac Office," on page 24, line 22, after the word "each" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "two at $1,400 each, three at $1,200 each," and insert "one $1,400, one $1,200," and in line 24 to strike out "$18,420" and insert "$14,620," so as to make the paragraph read:

For assistants in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac—1 $2,500, 1 $2,000, 2 at $1,800 each, 2 at $1,600 each, 1 $1,400, 1 $1,200; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $14,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 25, to strike out:

For pay of computers on piecework in preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac and in improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Engineering," on page 26, line 7, to strike out "$12,100,000" and insert "$14,795,000," so as to read:

ENGINEERING.

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; care, custody, and operation of the naval petroleum reserves; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, pay of classified force under the bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books, and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work in radiotelegraphy at the naval radio laboratory; in all, $14,795,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge the reason for this great increase over the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is $2,000,000 less than was urged by the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Robison, chief of the Bureau of Engineering. The appropriation covers the maintenance of very valuable and complicated machinery of the entire fleet, also the care of the machinery and the delicate instruments in the ships which may be put out of commission or kept in ordinary under the plan and program laid out by the department in pursuance of the reduction made in the Navy in the limitation of armament treaty. It was considered by the committee that the increase made here, from the testimony, which was quite voluminous both before the House committee and the Senate committee, was a comparatively small increase, and probably less than the bureau really ought to have. But we made it less than was asked for by the department in the hope and in the belief that the efforts which are being made by Admiral Robison, and which are referred to in the report of the Senate committee, will result in economy and that the cost of supplies and labor may be somewhat reduced and that by cutting down the appropriation considerably below what the department asked, an additional incentive will be furnished for extraordinary economy. With that in view and in order that there might not be an absolute insufficiency of funds to maintain the machinery of the ships and at the same time that there should be an incentive for economy, we compromised with the department by giving the increase which we have provided and at the same time refusing $2,000,000 requested.

Mr. KING. The explanation of the Senator is very clear and comprehensive, and I express my appreciation of the same, and yet I am not quite clear as to the reason for even the first amount. May I inquire of the Senator if there were any additional facts presented to the Senate committee over those which were presented to the House committee? The Senator stated, as I understood him, that the hearings were very extensive both before the House and Senate committees. I have read some of the hearings. The House went into matters more fully than did the Senate committee. I have no doubt the House committee evidenced just as great a desire to take care of the machinery and property of the Government as did the Senate committee. What reason did they have for limiting the appropriation to $12,000,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was this difference. In the first place, the Senate committee went more extensively into an examination of the question than did the House committee. There was a great amount of detail testimony from the chief of the bureau and other experts before the Senate committee. But in addition to that is the important circumstance that the figures in the House bill were based upon a Navy of 67,000 men, which was the proposed enlisted strength of the Navy provided in the bill reported to the House. As it passed the House, the House of Representatives increased the personnel 19,000 men, to 86,000, but there was no increase made in the appropriation by the House. There was an expectation there, I may say, if it is not inappropriate, that when the bill came to the Senate corresponding adjustments of the various appropriations for the bureaus to comport with the increase in the personnel would be made. That accounts to a large extent for the increase.

It was estimated by the chief of the bureau and the Secretary of the Navy that if only 67,000 men were allowed they would not be able to keep in commission the same number of ships that they would be able to keep in commission with 86,000 men. They figured that with 67,000 men they could only keep in commission 12 battleships, but with 86,000 men they could keep in commission the entire quota of 18 battleships allowed the United States under the international agreement. They figured they could only keep in commission some 80 destroyers. With 86,000 men they can keep in commission 103 destroyers, and so as to a number of other classes of ships, making a corresponding increase in appropriation for maintenance of machinery of the vessels.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Washington to say that the House increased the personnel of the Navy 19,000 men and yet made no increase whatever in the appropriation for the pay of those added numbers. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said that in the item of engineering, and also in other items of the bill, except those of pay and provisions, there were no increases made. My understanding is that it was the expectation of those who were responsible and particularly interested in the bill that the Senate would make increases in the appropriations for the various bureaus, in addition to pay and provisions, to correspond with the increased number of men. The only items increased by the House of Representatives on account of the increase in personnel were the obvious items where an exact calculation could be made as to pay and provisions. Those items have had to be revised by the Senate committee—at least the Senate committee recommends the necessity for revising them—by reason of the change of law as to pay which had been enacted since the House passed the bill. But as to engineering, as to construction and repairs, as to maintenance of yards and docks, as to fuel and transportation, as to maintenance of supplies and accounts, as to ordnance and ordnance stores, and as to transportation and recruiting no increase was made by the House of Representatives on account of the increase made in the number of men.

Mr. KING. The paragraph, beginning on page 25 and ending on page 26, is so confusing that it is impossible for one to read and determine just what branches of the naval service are included within it or just what property is to be cared for and repaired, and just what the expenditures call for are in detail. For instance, it states in line 7:

> For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus.

The statement of the Senator from Washington would seem to indicate that the greater part of this nearly $15,000,000 related to the care of delicate machinery which must be taken care of because some of the vessels are withdrawn from commission. Then we find included in this paragraph provision for—

> Range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service.

I am not sure whether this is to purchase all these various classes of naval machinery or merely for their repair. Then reference is made to—

> Care, custody, and operation of the naval petroleum reserves.

How much is to be devoted to the operation of naval oil reserves? Does that mean that the Government is to begin the development of the naval oil reserves, sink oil wells, construct pipe lines, and conserve the oil? If so, how much of the fourteen or fifteen million dollars is to be devoted to that purpose? There is nothing to indicate that. I do not know what part of the $15,000,000 is to be devoted to the operation of the naval petroleum reserves. The able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] a few days ago offered a resolution of inquiry and, as I remember, called for information from the Secretary of the Interior relative to one of the naval oil reserves in Wyoming. Is it contemplated that we shall appropriate for the purpose of opening that reserve?

I pause at this point to ask the Senator from Washington if he will kindly advise the Senate what part of the $15,000,000 is to be devoted to the operation of the naval petroleum reserves referred to in line 21?

Mr. POINDEXTER. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KING. Can that be used for some other purpose?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It could; but it is allotted and intended to be used for that purpose by the Navy. The appropriation, as the Senator will notice, follows invariably the form of appropriations under this head in being in a lump sum covering the various items which the Senator has mentioned, leaving to the department the segregation and allotment of the funds to the various activities in that bureau.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether it is the custom of the Navy Department, where figures are furnished upon which an appropriation is sought and the appropriation is made, to use the appropriation thus obtained for some other purpose than that for which it was designed by the committee and by the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. My information is that that has not been the custom of the department, although that is sometimes done when an emergency arises. However, the custom of the department is to adhere with considerable strictness to allotment of funds which is set out ordinarily before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. KING. Assume that no operations are carried on in the naval petroleum reserve, and that $100,000 were not expended for that purpose, could that fund be devoted to some other purpose covered in this provision?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Under the law it could be; the law would permit it. It would be subject to the disposition of some proper use, under the language of that paragraph, but not beyond that, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KING. I understand. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very improper way of legislating. I can appreciate that if there is a similitude, if I may be permitted that expression, of all of the items in a given paragraph, in case of the failure to devote the entire estimate suggested for a given purpose, it might be used for other items of the same character. For instance, if in a bill $15,000,000 were appropriated for a battleship and the figures which were submitted to the Committee on Appropriations as the basis of the appropriation called for $10,000 for a smokestack and $5,000 for a stairway, and it should be discovered in the prosecution of the work that the staircase was not needed, I can understand that, perhaps, there would be no impropriety in utilizing the $5,000 for some other purpose in the construction of the ship; but to take that $5,000 and use it to buy a motor boat or to acquire land or to buy supplies, would, in my opinion, be highly improper and would subject the department to criticism.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator, but, taking the illustration suggested by him, it would be impossible to use the money for any one of the other purposes indicated. In this instance the appropriation could not be used for any purpose other than that provided under the heading of the appropriation and specified in the appropriation. For instance, the purchase of land or the purchase of supplies would come under an entirely different bureau and come out of an entirely different fund. None of this money could be used for any such purpose as that.

Mr. KING. Now, let me bring that matter home to the provision under discussion. The committee very wisely—and I will assume that the committee acted wisely because I have such confidence in them—under the evidence adduced felt constrained to add to this bill $100,000 in a lump sum for the care, custody, and operation of the naval petroleum reserves.

Suppose Secretary of the Navy Denby, acting under information which comes to him and which he did not possess at the time that he or those under him appeared before the committee and solicited the appropriation, concluded that it would be unwise to utilize that $100,000 for the development of the naval petroleum reserves; I submit that it would be highly improper for Secretary Denby or for any official of the Navy Department to take that $100,000 and apply it to some other purpose; for instance, the payment of employees who might give their attention to some of the activities that are to be performed under the provisions of this paragraph. I think that it would be unfair; and that is the reason, it seems to me, that these bills are misleading to those who have not before them the estimates of the department. When we ask for the information and are advised that the department estimated $100,000 for the development of the petroleum reserves, and the committee and the Senate vote for the $100,000 in the aggregate, with the understanding that it will be utilized for that purpose, I submit that it is improper for it to be applied to some other purpose.

I do not know how we are going to remedy the situation, unless we should add to this bill a proviso that no part of the $15,000,000 shall be used for any other purpose than that indicated in the specifications submitted by the Navy Department to the committee which became the basis of the aggregate appropriation of $15,000,000.

I am unwilling to vote, Mr. President, for these shotgun appropriations, be they $15,000,000 or $5,000,000, which the committee were induced to put into the bill upon information submitted to them, with the understanding that the Navy Department may, if it wishes, cancel the appropriations with respect to some of the items mentioned and devote the amounts for which they asked to some other purpose within the scope of the paragraph.

I am sure that the able Senator from Washington, who is notoriously so fair and so judicial in his actions, in his conduct, and in his consideration of legislative matters, will agree with me; and I ask him if his committee, before the bill is passed, will not frame an amendment which will deal with this and other provisions of the bill in harmony with the views which I have suggested? If not, I shall ask for further information before I am willing to vote for the appropriation of this large sum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I feel that the committee will be glad to give thought to the Senator's suggestion. I myself shall do so. I hope, however, that the Senator himself will give additional thought to the matter. His suggestion is a very radical one and would revolutionize the methods of administering the various departments of the Government. If the system which the Senator suggests should be applied to the Navy Department, no doubt it should be applied to all of the other departments.

Mr. KING. Exactly; I agree with the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We would have Congress as a legislative body undertaking to go into details and limiting expenditures in each bureau to a certain amount for every particular activity. Undoubtedly it would result, in many instances, in tying up the department and result in loss to the Government. Whether on the whole, in view of what the Senator has said, the country would lose or benefit by it may be the subject of speculation, but I doubt exceedingly whether it would be wise without an investigation.

If the Senator at some time would propose a complete inquiry into the subject governing the appropriations of Congress, it might serve a very useful purpose, but until such inquiry has been made, the expediency of undertaking to revolutionize the method of making appropriations while we are in the midst of the consideration of an appropriation bill, upon the floor of the Senate, seems very doubtful.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate that there is a good deal of merit in what my able friend has said, and yet I want him to view the other side of the shield. We have in this bill appropriations for Bremerton, for Mare Island, for San Diego, and for various other naval bases and stations. How did the committee reach the conclusion that $250,000 or $750,000 should go to Mare Island; that $500,000 or $600,000 should go to Bremerton; that $250,000 should go to Norfolk; and that $225,000 should go to Newport? They did it upon the testimony which was adduced before them, and they exercised their judgment based upon a full investigation. They did not vote for an appropriation of $225,000 for Newport upon the theory that if the department later concluded to shut up Newport the $225,000 could be transferred to Bremerton or Mare Island or to any other place. It seems to me that it is too clear for argument that there ought to be some limitation placed upon the power of the Navy Department to make transfers of appropriations thus provided in an omnibus bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the point suggested by the Senator is covered by the bill. It would be impossible where there are specific appropriations such as those he has mentioned to use them for any other purpose. They could not be transferred from the purpose specified in the law.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true as to the general appropriation for the Bureau of Engineering. The items which go to make up the amount are not segregated in the proposed act; the whole appropriation is confined to engineering and can not be used for any other purpose. Furthermore, there is not a sufficient appropriation, in all probability, according to the testimony before the committee, to serve the actual needs of the Navy unless the utmost economy is exercised.

I may illustrate what the Senator has said about appropriations, for instance, by taking a naval station. If Congress makes an appropriation for Pearl Harbor and specifies that there shall be an extension of a machine shop, we would not go into details and provide how much shall be expended for the brick and how much shall be expended for labor and how much shall be expended for the roofing and the other different materials which enter into the building, and I doubt very much whether it would be wise to undertake to do that.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There must be a point where, in the interest of efficiency, some discretion is left to the executive branch as to the expenditure of the money which is put in their hands, restricted by the general terms of the purpose for which it is appropriated.

Mr. KING. But, to carry out the illustration which the Senator has just given—and absolutely I agree with the Senator so far as he has gone—suppose the Navy Department had come before the Senator's committee and said it was necessary that there should be constructed at Pearl Harbor a house for the officers and a building for the storing of ammunition and a tower for radio purposes, and figured out that $2,000,000 would be required for the various items presented to the committee; and the committee, instead of stating that $200,000 should be appropriated for the officers' quarters, $1,000,000 for the ammunition depot, and so on, had lumped the amount together and fixed the aggregate at $2,000,000 for the construction of the radio station, the officers' quarters, and the depot, and after the Navy had made further investigations, and before the money had been expended, they concluded that they did not need as large a radio station or as large a depot for ammunition as they had contemplated, and that instead of a million dollars for the depot $500,000 would be adequate. I deny that they would have the right to take the $500,000 thus salvaged and apply it to the radio station; and yet that is what could be done under this bill and under the policies and methods heretofore pursued and employed.

Coming back to the paragraph before us, there is a provision—and the Senator has argued to us the importance of it—carrying $15,000,000. He called our attention to the delicate machinery, the fine armament, and the fact that they must be preserved; and I agree with the Senator. He did not tell us, and I did not know until I read the bill carefully, that part of this $15,000,000 was for the operation and development of the naval reserves.

If I had not examined the bill carefully, I would have supposed from the Senator's statement—and he made it frankly, and intended to make a full and complete canvass of the situation—that a part of the appropriation was for some other purpose than that indicated by the Senator. My point is that the Navy Department would not have the right to use for other purposes in the bill that $100,000 which they had asked for to open up an oil reserve. Is there any intimate relation between the oil reserve in Wyoming or in California and caring for the machinery, so that an appropriation for machinery and for the oil reserve would permit the interchange of the appropriation? Would it be right to use $100,000 appropriated for the oil reserve for the purpose of building a gun, or to use $100,000 appropriated for the purpose of building a gun for opening up an oil reserve, simply because both appropriations were stated in a lump sum and carried in the same paragraph?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, I did not undertake, in the general statement which I made of the purpose of this appropriation, to cover every dollar and every particular expenditure. I referred to the importance of maintaining machinery; and I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the estimates which are given us, out of an allowance of $14,795,000, $12,061,323 comes under the head of "ship costs"—that is, the maintenance and repair of machinery on ships—so that, I think, substantially supports the statement which I made.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator concedes that they could not use the $100,000 for the naval oil reserve for the construction of ships?

Mr. POINDEXTER. For the construction of ships? Certainly.

Mr. KING. For the purpose the Senator indicated—that $12,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For the maintenance of the machinery of ships?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It could be used if the Secretary of the Navy sanctioned its use for that purpose.

Mr. KING. Though it was appropriated for the development of the oil reserve?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is all appropriated for engineering. It is not appropriated for the development of the oil reserves. If it were appropriated for the development of the oil reserves by the terms of the law, it could not be used for any other purpose. The whole question which the Senator is arguing is whether or not it ought to be appropriated in that way. It never has been appropriated in that way. Of course, if it were, it would have to be used for that purpose.

Mr. KING. Suppose that the Navy Department had not said a word about the operation of the naval oil reserves, and had not asked for a cent of appropriation, would that $100,000 have gone into this lump sum?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would not have been taken into account in making up the total.

Mr. KING. It would have carried $100,000 less, would it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very likely it would.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator intends to permit the Navy Department to use $100,000, if they want to, for a purpose for which it was not designed by the committee, and when they would not have made the appropriation if they had not understood that it would be devoted to the operation of the naval oil reserves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would let this matter go over, and give me a chance, if the Senator does not frame an amendment, to do so; or, if the Senator will consent if I move to reconsider to-morrow in order to offer an amendment, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, if the Senator should desire to do so, I shall have no objection. I should like to get a decision on this amendment.

Mr. KING. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 26, line 13, to strike out "$1,675,000" and insert "$2,048,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of United States inspectors of machinery and engineering material for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $2,048,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Washington? On line 7, $14,795,000 was appropriated. The Senator will recall that in other parts of the bill provisions are made—quite liberal provisions, I think—for clerical help, civil employees, and so forth; yet, out of this $14,795,000, which ostensibly is for machinery, we allow $2,048,000 for clerical help, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of United States inspectors of machinery and engineering material. It does seem to me that that sum, $2,048,000, for clerical help and for messengers and for inspection, is entirely disproportionate to the sum appropriated for the purposes indicated. I ask the Senator if, from the testimony before the committee, he conceives that such a large proportion of the $14,000,000 should be devoted to that end?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator will observe that that is merely a limitation, that not exceeding that amount shall be used for the purposes which the Senator mentions. The most important element within that limitation is the services of draftsmen for machinery, a very high class of technical skill being required. High-priced men and a considerable number of them are necessary for the maintenance of the machinery in a fleet such as is provided for in this bill—18 battleships, various scout cruisers, and submarines, and auxiliary vessels that go to make up the fleet. The language of this limitation is simply an adoption of the ordinary language of appropriation bills. These matters have grown up from year to year through experience in the departments, and the language is retained in the form which Congress has been accustomed to use in making appropriations.

Mr. KING. Is it contemplated that under this section new machinery will be constructed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; not new machinery; but it contemplates repairs to old machinery.

Mr. KING. Will draftsmen of the high grade of which the Senator speaks be required for the repair work? The important feature seems to be clerical work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For the machinery of new vessels under construction the drafting would be paid out of this appropriation, but not for the hulls.

Mr. KING. I have not the testimony before me, and so I am unable to state what it is. I take the word of the Senator. It seems to me, though, that it is a very large appropriation. This seems to be another exhibition of the absolute extravagance of the Navy Department, and if one tried to put his hand upon the many evidences of their extravagance he would be having his fingers extended all the time. This is one paragraph which, in my judgment, shows very great waste and extravagance on the part of the Navy Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 29, line 1, to strike out "$14,200,000" and insert "$16,200,000," so as to read:

CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR OF VESSELS.

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; steam steerers, steam capstans, steam windlasses, and all other auxiliaries; labor in navy yards and on foreign stations; purchase of machinery and tools for use in shops; carrying on work of experimental model tank and wind tunnel; designing naval vessels; construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat; general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses for vessels and navy yards, inspectors' offices, such as photographing, books, professional magazines, plans, stationery, and instruments for drafting room, and for pay of classified force under the bureau; for hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; specifications for purchase thereof shall be so prepared as shall give fair and free competition; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; interior appliances and tools for manufacturing purposes in navy yards and naval stations; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipage at home and abroad; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith and manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; naval signals and apparatus, other than electric, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, running lights, and lamps and their appendages for general use on board ship for illuminating purposes; and oil and candles used in connection therewith; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; for all permanent galley fittings and equipage; rugs, carpets, curtains, and hangings on board naval vessels, $16,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Bureau of Ordnance," on page 30, line 21, to strike out "$9,500,000" and insert "$10,000,000," so as to read:

ORDNANCE AND ORDNANCE STORES.

For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships, for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, naval ordnance plants, and proving grounds; for maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and naval ordnance plants, and for target practice; for the maintenance, repair, or operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled freight and passenger carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, naval ordnance plants, and naval torpedo stations, and for the pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots; in all, $10,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 2, to strike out:

That no part of this appropriation or any other appropriation contained in this act shall be available for expenditure at the Naval Proving Ground, Dahlgren, Va., except so much as may be necessary to maintain the station on a closed-down basis.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, this amendment, I think, will provoke some discussion, and I ask the chairman of the committee if he desires to proceed this evening with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is the purpose of the committee to proceed for a little while longer, and then we expect to move an executive session. I prefer that course. If the Senator is not prepared to go on with this amendment now, I will consent to let it go over.

Mr. FRANCE. It is nearly 6 o'clock now, and——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to passing over the amendment on the request of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 32, line 25, to strike out "$25,893,986," and insert in lieu thereof "pay, $25,586,102; rental allowance, $5,712,771; subsistence allowance, $3,218,643; in all, $34,517,516."

Mr. KING. I shall move to-morrow to reduce the personnel of the Navy, and it will affect the item under consideration. I have no objection to the amendment being agreed to to-night, if the Senator desires, with the understanding that I may move to reconsider for the purpose of offering my amendment. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator agrees that we shall proceed with these items, and, of course, if the motion of the Senator from Utah to reduce the personnel should be agreed to, I would be very glad to consent to go back over it again.

Mr. KING. That is what I ask. I want to help the Senator expedite the passage of the bill as far as possible.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 2, after the words "retired list," to strike out "$3,114,840" and insert "$3,623,715"; and beginning in line 3 to strike out:

commutation of quarters for officers, including boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, machinists, pharmacists, pay clerks, and mates, naval constructors, and assistant naval constructors, $1,310,400; and also members of Nurse Corps (female), $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 11, to strike out the words "or commutation of quarters not to exceed the amount which an officer would receive were he not serving with troops"; on line 17 to strike out "$675,566" and insert in lieu thereof "$944,689"; and on line 19 to strike out "$5,981,900" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,809,675," so as to read:

for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $20,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $944,689; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge, $2,809,675.

Mr. KING. I did not know we had reached the item on lines 17 and 18. May I inquire of the Senator whether the Senate committee had any additional evidence before it which justified it in increasing the item of "$675,566" to "$944,689" for pay of enlisted men on the retired list? It seems to me that is a matter as to which there would be no difference. You would base it upon evidence submitted by the department, and the House and Senate ought to reach the same conclusion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is due to the change made in the law by the pay bill which has just been passed. The calculations are based upon that.

Mr. KING. Would there be a greater number of retired men or would they merely receive a larger sum?

Mr. WARREN. Both.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course the increase in the Navy will result in an increased number of retired enlisted men.

Mr. KING. I comprehend that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 20, after the word "pay" to insert the words "and allowances."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 24, after the word "Corps," to strike out "$62,108,534" and insert "pay, $75,356,780; allowance for lodging and subsistence, $2,836,050; in all, $78,192,830."

Mr. KING. The same situation has developed with respect to the item of $78,192,830 as suggested a moment ago. If my amendment reducing the personnel of the Navy should prevail then a reduction would necessarily have to be made in this item.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On behalf of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out of the amendment, lines 1 and 2, on page 34, the words "allowance for lodging and subsistence, $2,836,050; in all, $78,192,930," for the reason that a mistake was made in putting this item under the head of "Pay of the Navy," the impression being that that was required by the new pay law. As a matter of fact, it should be retained under the head, "Provisions, Navy." It is a mere matter of its proper place in the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator desires to remove it from this line?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I simply desire to transpose the appropriation of $2,836,070 from the head "Pay of the Navy" to "Provisions, Navy," and when we reach "Provisions, Navy" I shall offer an amendment to insert the language there. I move to strike out of the amendment of the committee, as printed in the bill, in lines 1 and 2, on page 34, the language "allowance for lodging and subsistence, $2,836,050; in all, $78,192,830."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much gratified that we have made such good progress with the bill to-day, and I think perhaps it would subserve an expeditious conclusion of the bill if we would suspend its consideration at this time until to-morrow morning.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 65, line 14, after the word "purposes," insert the following:

"That any officer of the Navy who has served four years as chief of a bureau in the Navy Department and shall be retired subsequent to the completion of such period of service for physical disability due to wounds inflicted by the enemy while in the performance of his duty shall be retired with the rank, pay, and allowances now authorized by law for the retirement of a chief of bureau."

DECISIONS OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I deplore the tendency of the times to criticize public men and public institutions in our country. It seems that our people—a great many of them, at least—have almost gone mad in trying to find fault with somebody.

A great deal of propaganda has gone out abusing the South for employing children in cotton mills. I do not propose to take up more than a moment or two of the Senate's time, but I expect to make a few remarks on this subject within a few days. This is done either intentionally, with a view of trying to injure our section and to injure the business of manufacturing, or it is done ignorantly. I notice in the papers almost every day some misrepresentations about this occupation. They are entirely unjustified and unfounded. I believe that there are child-labor laws in 46 States of the Union. We have stringent laws on the subject in my State, and no child under 14 years of age has worked in a cotton mill there for a number of years. The progress that we are making in that section is phenomenal. The improvements in education and in refinement and in living conditions are unsurpassed in any part of our Union. However, well-meaning people, I take it, or perhaps some fanatics, or members of this so-called "uplift" crowd who ought to be at work, are going around trying to disturb the public mind and trying to create dissatisfaction between employer and employee.

I have no patience whatever with any such procedure; and, as I say, it is unfounded in our part of the country, and absolutely unjustified. I deplore to see in an afternoon paper that a member of the Cabinet paid his respects to the Congress in no complimentary terms. I also deplore to see in the morning paper that a Member of Congress has so far forgotten himself as to abuse the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, I take it that the Supreme Court needs no defense at my hands; but I say if there is one institution in the United States that we ought to be proud of, it is the Supreme Court.

All the recent criticism of that court has been unfounded, uncalled for, and out of place; and if there is anything that we desire more than another, it is a perpetuation of the Constitution of the United States and of the Supreme Court. I only wish that other bodies besides the Supreme Court would act in as just a manner as they do, and in as courageous a manner.

It is startling, it is terrifying, to see the tendency of legislative bodies to follow the popular whim, whether it be right or be wrong.

Mr. President, I do hope that Congress at least will keep its equilibrium, and not run off at a tangent, following these false notions. It is time that we were calling a halt, and I hope that these matters will not receive serious attention. They should not even be introduced into this body.

I shall have more to say later; but I say that the Supreme Court of the United States and, in fact, all the courts in the United States enjoy and have enjoyed the confidence and the respect and the esteem of the people of this country. Even during the Civil War the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States were unanimously respected and looked up to. So it is out of place, it is in poor taste, to criticize them now; and I feel that these criticisms come from people who are trying to disrupt our Government. Very recently the court has made some important decisions. I do not suppose that any first-class lawyer in the United States would question the soundness and the wisdom of those decisions; and I say that if there is one temporal thing more than another that we ought to pray for, it is the perpetuation of the Constitution of the United States and of the courts.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business to-day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OFFICE OF RECORDER OF DEEDS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 26), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a commission is hereby created, consisting of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker, to investigate the needs of the office of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, and to report not later than December 20, 1922, (1) what quarters, equipment, and facilities are necessary properly to care for and protect all records and papers in such office, and (2) what additional personnel, if any, is required to perform the duties imposed by law upon such office.

PROCTER & GAMBLE CO.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in his remarks yesterday the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] referred to the Procter & Gamble Co., of my State, as being interested in legislation relative to feedstuffs. I thought at the time he was mistaken. I have since ascertained that he was mistaken. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I send to the desk stating the facts.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 14, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our attention called to press dispatch of Senator BROUSSARD in reference to tariff on blackstrap molasses. This company is not interested, and has taken no part whatever in connection with tariff legislation on this item.

THE PROCTER & GAMBLE CO.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 16, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we bow at Thy footstool in the name of Him who was wounded for our transgressions. We will say of Thee, Thou art our refuge and strength; and with gratitude our hearts proclaim it. Let all the people praise Thee, O Lord. Preserve them from the perils of exaggerated and malicious speech. May our fellow countrymen move forward with constant pride and enthusiastic passion for the tenets of our great Government. Everywhere increase reverence for law and for those fundamentals established by our forefathers. In the questions of the day enable us to be wise, prudent, and reflective. Give us confidence in Thy truth, and help us to build upon the rock that can not be shaken. In the name of Jesus, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a member of the Committee on the Reorganization of the Executive Departments, to take the place of Mr. REAVIS, resigned, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER].

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 246 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

VIEWS OF MINORITY IN PAUL v. HARRISON.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Elections No. 1, I ask unanimous consent that the minority be given until June 26 to file minority views. That agreement was had in the committee on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the minority of Committee on Elections No. 1 have until June 26 to file minority views in the contested-election case of Paul against Harrison. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, of course that is not to interfere with the consideration of the case?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; it is to interfere with consideration of the case before the 26th. By an agreement in the committee yesterday the minority were to be given until the 26th to file minority views, and it was understood that the case was not to be taken up before that time.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no idea that we will take it up, but I had not heard of any agreement.

Mr. ROSE. It was agreed in the committee that the minority might have 10 days in which to file minority views. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] made the motion in the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 11827. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3610. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River near Steubenville, Ohio; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8785. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Mobridge Bridge Co., of Mobridge, S. Dak., to construct a pontoon bridge across the Missouri River;

H. R. 11345. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Freeport, Pa.;

H. R. 11827. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county courts of Howard and Saline Counties, in the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River; and

H. R. 10330. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Croix at or near the city of Prescott, in the State of Wisconsin.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DUNN, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family (at the request of Mr. PARKER of New York).

To Mr. MONTOYA, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11872.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11872) to amend sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Panama Canal act; to amend sections 288, 289, 342, 343, 368, and 461 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone; and section 2 of the Executive order of July 9, 1914, establishing rules and regulations for the opening and navigation of the Panama Canal and approaches thereto, including all water under its jurisdiction; to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and to regulate divorces in the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to talk about the bill under consideration to amend the Panama act. I suppose it is all right, but it is only chicken feed in comparison with the bill I am going to call to your attention for a few minutes. I want to talk about the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals. [Applause.]

The people back home and in every part of the country are complaining and are becoming dissatisfied about the delay of Congress in acting on the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals. Some of them seem to think that any Member of Congress can call this bill up and have it voted on at any time, but we know that such is not the case. We know that the Republican leaders, especially the Republican steering committee and the Republican members of the Rules Committee, decide which bills shall and which bills shall not be considered and voted on. So I want to address my remarks especially to these leaders and the members of the committees I have referred to and urge them to allow the bill reported by the Military Committee providing for the acceptance of the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals property to be called up, considered, and voted upon.

This measure is neither sectional nor political; it is a great economical question, in which all of the people in every part of the country are most vitally interested. No other subject of legislation during this session of Congress has attracted such favorable and nation-wide interest. There is ten times more interest in this than there is in the tariff, the ship subsidy, or any other legislation pending in Congress. [Applause.] What answer could you give to the country and your constituents when you go back home if you refused to allow the House to vote on this question at this session? [Applause.]

You could not claim that it was for the want of time. We have plenty of time while we are waiting on the Senate to consider the bills which have already passed the House. You could not justify it on account of the amount to be appropriated. If the Ford offer is accepted, it will not cost the Government a penny in the end. Of course, under the provisions of the Ford offer the Government will advance about $7,000,000 a year for the next six years to complete the water-power development, but the Ford Co. will pay 4 per cent interest as an annual rental on these amounts, and by means of a sinking fund and amortization plan repay the entire amount to the Goverment during the period of the lease. At the same time the dams and all equipment, which will be of immense value, will be the absolute property of the Government.

Besides this it will save the Government many millions of dollars in caring for the Muscle Shoals nitrate plants, which will be kept in an up-to-date running order by the Ford Co., and be available to the Government without expense for war purposes if ever needed.

We have been diligent in our efforts to enact legislation in the interest of the farmers; we have secured large amounts of national aid to rural roads; we have provided a system of farm-loan banks at a low rate of interest; we have revived the activities of the War Finance Corporation in order to assist the farmers in marketing their crops; we have recently enacted a cooperative marketing bill. We now have an opportunity to do something further by accepting the Ford offer and protecting the American farmers from further imposition by the Chilean and Fertilizer Trusts, who fix and manipulate the prices of fertilizer at their will without regard to the price of farm products or the financial ability of the American farmer.

There are 6,500,000 farmers in all parts of this country asking and urging Congress to accept the Ford offer. They are intelligent and know what it will mean for them. They represent an investment of $80,000,000,000, by far the largest of any business, the next largest being that of railroading, with $20,000,000,000 investment. The farmers are expecting Congress in this way to enable them to get from under the yoke of the Chilean Nitrate and Fertilizer Trusts.

Some one may say that there is no Fertilizer Trust. We all know that there is, but they are so smart that we might have trouble in proving it in the courts. They certainly have an agreement as to sales, prices, and distribution. When the price of corn, wheat, cotton, and other farm crops goes down the trust raises the price of fertilizer.

Do not let any Member of this House deceive himself by thinking that the interest in this bill is confined to the farmers in any section or limited part of this country. They are all interested, from Maine to California. The yield of wheat in some of the Western States has been reduced from 50 to 20 bushels per acre on account of depletion of the soil. If they do not all use fertilizer now it will not be long before they will have to, and will do so if they can get a good grade at a fair price.

Neither should you deceive yourselves by thinking that the interest in this bill is confined to the farmers. The Members of the House from the cities, as well as the rural districts, should help to get this bill up and vote for it. It will enable the farmer to double the production of cotton, live stock, and food crops, and reduce the cost of living. It will provide an increased demand for what the manufacturer and wholesale and retail merchants have to sell.

A few Members of this House from the city districts continue to make the mistake of voting against national aid to roads. Good roads improve the farms. When the farmer increases his production the cost of living in the city is reduced. You city Congressmen should run over each other to help get this Ford bill before the House and vote for it. [Applause.]

Do not worry about Mr. Ford not being able to make cheap fertilizer and do everything else at Muscle Shoals that he claims will be done if his offer is accepted. Thomas A. Edison and other experts on the subject say that it is practicable. Henry Ford has always succeeded in everything he has undertaken. His business success is the marvel of the century. The people have faith in him and his big plans at Muscle Shoals, so let us give him a trial. [Applause.]

He does not want Muscle Shoals in order to make money; he has all and more than he needs. He wants to do something more for his fellow man. He wants to make fertilizer, automobiles, trucks, tractors, and aluminum ware cheaper than ever before so that people of limited means may be able to obtain these articles which ordinarily would be beyond their reach. [Applause.]

If his offer is accepted, he will give work at good wages to tens of thousands of people from every part of the country, many of whom are ex-service men, who are out of employment and who are waiting in breathless suspense for Congress to pass this great measure. [Applause.]

The Ford offer was made about a year ago at the invitation of this administration and was sent to Congress with other offers some five months ago, all of which were referred to the Military Committee of the House composed of 15 Republicans and 6 Democrats. This committee after four months of earnest, faithful, and hard work in the consideration of these offers, has reported a bill providing for the acceptance of the offer of Henry Ford and filed their report recommending its acceptance, and at the same time reporting that they did not consider any other offer as being worthy of serious consideration. While the report of the committee is not unanimous, still the full committee urges prompt consideration and disposition of this important question.

The issue is now made up with the great masses of the people in favor of the Ford offer on one side and the Chilean nitrate and fertilizer trusts and other selfish interests with their active and insidious lobby on the other. [Applause.] The Members of this House compose the jury to decide this issue.

In conclusion, I urge the Republican leaders of the House who have it in their power to have this measure brought before the House for decision to make provision promptly for a rule in order that it may be considered and voted upon.

Let the roll of the House be called, and let each Member answer "yes" or "no." If it is passed, the country will know who did it; if it is defeated, the country will know upon whom to place the responsibility. Give us a vote, and when this is done I hope and confidently believe that the last and final offer of Henry Ford, made on the 31st day of last month, will be accepted by a large majority. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield 10 minutes to tne gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the recent decision of the Supreme Court with reference to child labor laws has again called attention to the fact that we have an unreformed house of lords as the supreme government. The first child labor act, passed by both Houses with very little opposition, and signed by the President, has been declared by a bare majority of the Supreme Court unconstitutional. The second child labor act has also been declared unconstitutional. The Constitution is undoubtedly one of the greatest documents ever framed by man, but it was framed in 1787, and no one can seriously contend that the mightiest intellects of the eighteenth century could have foreseen the problems that confront us to-day. More than 1,800 amendments have been offered to the Constitution since 1787. The first 10 amendments are practically an integral part of the original Constitution and can hardly be classed as amendments. The original document could not have been ratified if the promise had not been held out that the 10 amendments would be immediately adopted. Two minor changes were made up to 1804. Three amendments are the result of the Civil War. Of the four amendments adopted in our generation two amendments—the woman suffrage and the prohibition amendments—can also be traced to the war. There would have been no prohibition amendment if it had not been for the war, and the woman-suffrage amendment has been hastened by the new current of thoughts born of the war.

It is impossible to reconcile democratic institutions with an institution which permits a bare majority of one or two of a court consisting of nine members to override the will of the elected representatives of the people.

I have given a good deal of thought to this question. I share the opinion of those who believe that it was never intended that the Supreme Court should have the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. Whatever the situation may be in that regard, the important thing before us today is to make the fundamental law of the land more flexible, more adapted to present conditions. It is proposed to offer an amendment to the Constitution to meet the objections of the Supreme Court in the child labor act.

Assuming that such an amendment after 15 or 20 years' agitation is adopted, the very adoption of the amendment permitting child-labor legislation will by implication be held to block other social legislation. The court will continue to nullify action by Congress and will prevent it from giving legislative expression to the wishes of the people. The stupendous economic and social changes of modern times emphasize the necessity of harmonizing the legal structure of society with its industrial needs.

The remedy lies in the direction of making the amendment provision of the Constitution more elastic, so that the Constitution should be a living organism, growing and expanding with the people.

The State of New York provides that a constitutional amendment may be adopted in the following manner: The amendment is adopted by the legislature, then it is proposed to the next legislature elected during a year at which senators are elected. Senators are elected in our State every two years. Then the amendment is submitted to the people, to a referendum, and if adopted it becomes a part of the constitution.

The present cumbersome method of changing the Constitution should be replaced by a simple and direct appeal to the people through a referendum, either upon the initiative of Congress or upon the initiative of a part of the people. In order to save the country from a general prevalence of contempt for the court, the court must not be put in a position where it will disregard the will of the people, where it will not set itself up against every progressive thought, where it will in the name of the dead past hinder the solution of living problems. Democracy is entitled to its faults, to its mistakes; democracy exercises its right to be stupid now and then, but democracy prefers to suffer from its own stupidity rather than from that of seven or nine men.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that the only people who are bound by the Constitution are those whom they elect to office and who take the oath to support it?

Mr. LONDON. Those who are elected to office to represent the people have their constitutional obligations. Every one of us who has sworn to support the Constitution has honestly voted for the child labor bill, for example, in the belief that he was supporting the Constitution. Our conception of the Constitution, and the conception of the United States Senate of the Constitution, and the conception of the President of the United States of the Constitution shall not be overridden by nine men.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is not answering the question that I propounded. I am asking the gentleman if he believes the ordinary citizen is not just as much bound to support and defend the Constitution as the elected officials?

Mr. LONDON. Undoubtedly. I did not think that was the question, because that answers itself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not the tendency of the times for members in legislative bodies, State and National, to pay less and less regard to the Constitution, and to pass all questions of constitutionality to the courts, the members of these legislative bodies thereby relieving themselves of their obligation, and impairing the highest and most solemn political morality? The Congress thus coerces the courts to pass upon such questions.

Mr. LONDON. But that is a most cowardly thing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course it is. Congress is more blameworthy than the courts.

Mr. LONDON. The legislator who deliberately votes for a law knowing that the Supreme Court will declare it unconstitutional is false to himself and false to his oath.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But is it not true that under our present system there is a great tendency to encourage the legislatures to ignore their obligations to the Constitution and to put the whole question up to the courts?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, when you permit the existence of an institution that is out of tune with the demands of the times the institution becomes a dead letter or an obstruction, and despite the prohibition of contempt it invites contempt. If it should be easier to amend the Constitution, it will become impossible for the legislator to evade responsibility and to throw the blame for defeating the will of the people upon the courts.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. In one moment. Let me illustrate this. We have now in session a convention of the American Federation of Labor, representing millions of law-abiding, organized workers, and the name of Chief Justice Taft, when mentioned, is hissed at that convention. When the Supreme Court sustained the income-tax law, the representatives of the plutocratic papers throughout the country condemned the Supreme Court in most vigorous terms. Most of the time, however, it is the progressive elements that are discontented, for the very simple reason that the decisions of the court are necessarily based upon the old past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me a couple of minutes more?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think that part of these results could be attributed to the direct primaries, in that there are numbers of legislators who go to the different legislatures with the idea of perpetuating themselves instead of perpetuating American institutions?

Mr. LONDON. Those who advocate the abolition of the direct primary are advocating the abolition of one of the democratic methods of bringing the Government under the control of the people.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. But the records show, if the gentleman will permit, that not more than 20 or 25 or 30 per cent of the people at most are ever out at the primaries.

Mr. LONDON. The people should take more interest in the primaries, but because only 30 per cent of the people participate in the primaries, it does not follow that the whole question of nominating officials should be left to a clique of half a dozen men in a saloon in the city of New York.

Mr. WALSH. Sometimes there is a contempt on the part of the people for constitutional amendments that have been adopted and laws that have been passed under them. Would the gentleman have the effect of a law or a constitutional amendment based upon whether it is held in contempt by the people?

Mr. LONDON. I think that a constitutional amendment that is forced upon the people by the peculiar provision that we have now, an amendment that is adopted really in disregard of the wishes of the people—and the gentleman is probably referring to the prohibition amendment and the Volstead law—is artificial. It is adopted by two-thirds of the vote of Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures, but is not adopted by the people. There is not any doubt that there would have been no such amendment on a referendum. That is why I have proposed that constitutional amendments should be voted for by the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD].

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, to my mind it is obvious that among the many questions with which the public mind is agitated no single one is hardly so acute to-day with the cultured and Christian thought of America as is the question, What will the nations do to relieve the shocking, harrowing butchery and slaughter of Christians in Armenia, and when will they do it, and what part will our Government take in it? Is the bloody battle-ax of the unspeakable Turk to hold its unchecked sway and wade on in Christian blood until there is no more Christian blood left for it to wade in? Or has the world an effective civilization, with a heart consecrated and an eye directed to the end and purpose of resisting this process? Will this great country, with its thousands of temple spires rising over Christian altars pretending to point the way to the Cross, its thousands of Christian schools strengthening and educating its Christian life and character, its countless millions of free-gift Christian offerings made to relieve suffering and to spread the gospel of peace and civilization, ever rise to "magnify its office" and to do the plain duty of executing the public will by exercising itself to put a stop to it?

For myself, I do not believe that tariffs, subsidies, or bonuses, or any other political or economic questions rise to the level of this great humanitarian question in the public conscience of America to-day. My desk is somewhat laden with evidences of the correctness of my opinion, and no doubt is that of every Member of this Congress.

From an editorial in the Living Church of May 27, 1922, I take the following:

It is reported that Great Britain has invited the United States to join her, with France and Italy, in the appointment of an international commission to investigate the Armenian situation and the Turkish atrocities in the Near East.

Recognizing the embarrassments of the present administration over such an invitation, as we do, we yet earnestly hope that it may be accepted. The American people owe it to the world to cooperate in protecting the Christian populations of the Near East from the Turks.

From the Right Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, bishop of North Carolina, come to me resolutions adopted May 17, 1922, by the Episcopal Convention of the Diocese of North Caorlina, calling upon our Government to—aid the Christian nations of the world to put a stop to these relentless persecutions of these ancient peoples of God.

I have presented this resolution for its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

From an archdeacon in my State, of date June 1, 1922, comes the following appeal:

Will you not raise your voice in the House of Representatives on behalf of our persecuted Christian brothers in Armenia? Could there be a darker stain on our Nation's story than to sit by quietly while those long-oppressed people are handed back to the sovereignty of the brutal and despotic Turks?

From a presiding elder of the Methodist Church comes an equally strong appeal, which among others of equal moral and intellectual force have compelled the submission of these remarks. I have answered them all that they should be addressed to some Member or Members of the Congress nearer in touch with the administration, and especially to members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, of which I have not the honor to be one.

These evidences of popular concern and of righteous indignation have caused me to observe, as far as my opportunities permit, the attitude of the administration on this great question.

The history of the present situation rightly begins probably with the treaty of Sevres, which met soon after the Versailles conference, and in which our Government did not directly participate. At that treaty the so-called ruler of so much as had survived of the Turkish Government, having to do with the Armenian status, or his diplomatic representative, executed an agreement that the then President of the United States should arbitrate certain boundary lines, the settlement of which was intended to mark the limitation of Turkish tyranny and atrocity upon the Armenians. Thereupon soon followed surveys and investigations looking to the question of a mandate on the part of this Government over the Armenian territory and population. Those of Brigadier General Mosely and of Major General Harbord are replete with information (S. Doc. 281, 66th Cong.). On the 24th of May, 1920, President Wilson addressed to the Congress a message responding to an official communication from the Senate, which communication was in the form of a resolution adopted by the Senate. This resolution, directed primarily to the protectorate along the line of railroad from Batum to Baku, is interesting to the point of my remarks for its recital of the facts of the "reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered, and that the people of the United States are deeply impressed by the deplorable conditions of insecurity, starvation, and misery now prevalent in Armenia." It constitutes an acknowledgment and recognition of these facts by the United Senate Senate. In his message the President made mention that—almost at the same time I received information that the conference of statesmen now sitting at San Remo, for the purpose of working out the details of peace with the Central Powers, had formally resolved to address a definite appeal to this Government to accept the mandate of Armenia.

Of great significance is one of the reasons given by that conclave of European statesmen for this request, to wit: "Because they believe that the appearance on the scene of the power emancipated from the prepossession of the Old World will inspire a wider confidence and afford a firmer guaranty for stability in the future than would the selection of any European power."

Readiness to accept this great responsibility and argument in support of its wisdom and necessity was given to the Congress in that message in the President's characteristic strength of expression, but unfortunately, as I believe, the proposition was emphatically repudiated by the Congress. Nothing, therefore, has come of the offer of the Turkish authorities to arbitrate the boundary line, nor of the suggested mandate in which the heart and soul of Christendom was so deeply involved. Persecutions, expatriations, atrocities, massacres, and butcheries have gone on and still continue. The appetite for blood and murder has grown on what it fed on, and rivers and waysides run red with Christian blood. Earlier evidences are contained in an article appearing in the New York Times on June 6, 1922, containing an interview with Dr. Mark H. Ward, of Suffern, N. Y., an American official of the Near East Relief, who has just returned from Harpoot, in which he relates facts, bringing them practically up to date. The human soul shudders and the blood runs cold at the reading of his recitals. I quote the following:

Doctor Ward told how men, women, and children had been forced by the Turks to toil over the roads, carrying such belongings as they most prized on their backs, until they fell exhausted. Between Sivas and Harpoot was counted 1,500 dead bodies.

This is recited here, Mr. Chairman, not to add to the horror of the evidence but to bring it up to date and to show that it is still not too late to do something.

Some time during the past winter the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], at the request of the office of the Armenian-American Society in New York City, introduced House Resolution No. 244. I submit a copy of it as a part of my remarks:

RESOLUTION.

Whereas the Armenians and other Christian peoples of Turkey continue in their evil plight and the refugees are unable to return to their homes; and

Whereas the evacuation of Cilicia, already begun, has brought calamity to the Christian population there; and

Whereas the humanitarian sentiment of the people of the United States is strongly enlisted in behalf of these Christian populations, for whom American relief has been generously given: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President be requested to express to the de facto government at Angora the moral protest of the United States against the persecution of the Armenians and other Christian peoples; and be it further

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to take up with Great Britain, France, and Italy the question of calling a conference for the purpose of considering methods by which the Armenians may be given an opportunity to establish themselves as a nation.

On the 7th day of March, 1922, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, to which this resolution was referred, held a hearing on it. There were present at the hearing Mr. Walter George Smith, president of the Armenian-American Society; Mr. George R. Montgomery, its director; Rev. Mihram T. Kalaidjaim, pastor under the Congregational Home Missionary Society and officially connected with the Armenian-American Society; Mr. G. H. Papazian; Mr. Charles V. Vickery, general secretary Near East Relief; Rev. W. C Emhardt, representing the presiding bishop and council of the Episcopal Church of the United States; and Mr. M. Vartan Malcom, of New York. A few extracts from the statements of these witnesses are submitted, bearing, first, upon the real conditions as now existing and the history of Armenian sufferings, to wit:

Question by Mr. COCKRAN. About how many of the population were left; what population is there now?

Mr. SMITH. I can only make a guess; there were at least 1,000,000 of them utterly destroyed.

Mr. LINEBERGER. A million massacred? Does that include battle casualties on both sides?

Mr. SMITH. I am not speaking of battle casualties; I am speaking of the actual massacres, estimated at 700,000, and those dying in deportation, estimated at 300,000.

Mr. COCKRAN. Were those massacres by troops or by infuriated people?

Mr. SMITH. By private persons—cutthroats and other persons among the Turks.

It is useless to continue recitals of these evidences of horror appearing by all the witnesses on this hearing. The current literature and news of the day is reeking with it, and the world stands aghast, astounded, and asking in despair, "Are governments useless or impotent? Is Christianity a failure, or is it afraid or too impotent to assert itself in a world of crime and lawlessness of these gigantic proportions?"

My remarks are intended to have a purpose and point beyond these recitals and beyond and outside of the things of the past, which the culture and Christianity of the world so much regret, that caused the Congress to repudiate the proffered mandate of the President. These things are water behind the wheel. They are gone, but I hope and believe not forever. I look for their return. The purpose of this speech is to ask—is to appeal—first, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House; next, to the whole House; and next to the State Department, and on and on wherever an appeal can properly lie, for as early action upon the spirit of that resolution now pending before the Foreign Affairs Committee as is compatible with the possibilities of human action in governmental agencies. This resolution has been slumbering in the office of that committee now for more than 90 days, while Christian blood still flows and murder and death horrify the world. Why should it not be reported out, is the question this speech is intended to ask. I am asking the question with official and personal respect to every member of that committee and to every agency of the Government higher up that may exercise its secret influence over its deliberations. I use this expression because I have been told by one who possibly knew, not a great distance from the committee room, that such influence was being exerted and the State Department did not want it reported. If this is so, it is my privilege to remark, "How wide the limit stands" between the policy of the State Department and the heart and soul of American Christianity and culture.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that governments of republics hardly less than those of monarchies have from time immemorial acted upon the doctrine that it will not do to let the people rule in the councils of international affairs. I am not disposed to subject myself to the charge sure to be made—of radicalism, demagoguery, and anarchy—far enough to assail this doctrine at this hour. Along its whole front it may have some strong intrenchments somewhere in the science of government and in human psychology. There may be something I do not see, some cause my limited experience has not revealed to me, why the people may be capable of exercising every other phase of self-government and be totally unfit to exercise this preeminently important one. It may be proper that far above the voice and touch of the great masses of mankind, whose hearts wring with anguish at such conditions, and who have been taught to think they had some sacred rights of direct interposition in the affairs of their Government, there should sit enthroned in a halo of sanctity and self-conceited wisdom a department having control exclusively of the Nation's foreign affairs. If so, it is a hard and disappointing thought to realize. It simply is not so. I do not know what reasons there may be acting upon this committee if not the influence above suggested, but I express the belief that there is one of an extraordinary character. As a committee composed of Members of the House of Representatives, in all respects, saving none, directly representing the people, I can not conceive of it that 90 days could pass after a recital before it of the facts it has heard, and that an appeal of the character which the hearings disclose would be refused action of some kind, giving its reasons for the same for this long a period, if there was not some cause controlling it which can not be appreciated beyond its secret councils. If this resolution is brought into the House with a favorable report, I venture the opinion that it will pass with practical unanimity.

Is it true that the prevailing view of international aloofness and exclusiveness from the touch of Europe growing out of the last election is the controlling cause? If so, I profess to represent the best sentiment of Christian culture of America in protesting against its application to this particular resolution. I know the popular vote of the election of 1920 is construed by this administration and all its supporters as a command to keep hands off of all the affairs of a struggling, suffering world if any of them are at the other end of an Atlantic cable. I protest against the correctness of that construction, but to quarrel with it now and here would detract from rather than add to the possibilities of any effect my appeal might have because there is hardly any limit to which partisan sensibility and consequent resentment may not sometimes go. I am protesting only against the application of the mandate of the American vote in the 1920 election to the case at bar—to the resolution to which I am speaking. Perhaps the committee asserts its justification in its view of the real effectiveness and the practicability of the resolution itself. Perhaps the controlling influence of the committee thinks the resolution impracticable and that it would accomplish nothing. To that argument I address myself, first, by the citation of some of the reasons given by some of the witnesses for asking for its adoption. These witnesses are of high intellectual and moral equipment. Their souls are consecrated to this great question.

They have studied it, consulted over it, and prayed over it, after all of which they have asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to introduce it. They are not committed with slavish adherence to the particular language of its text. They seek after its spirit. What, then, is its spirit? Its spirit is that this Government should make a "moral protest against the persecution of the Armenian and other peoples," and that with such force as it has frequently done in the past for similar causes and in similar instances; that it should take up with Great Britain, France, and Italy this question and, if thought good, call a conference for the purpose of jointly considering it. If there is harm and danger in this, then certainly this Government and its people are asleep over the crater of a volcano of which the people do not know and of which they are entitled to be informed. By this I mean that if such a delicate, tender, and inoffensive action as this may have in it the possibilities of international embarrassment and serious complications, or if the probabilities of war would be involved in it, then certainly our condition is much more precarious and unfortunate than the people have imagined. If national diplomacy is so chary, cautious, and justly subject to alarm as this would indicate, then the sword of Damocles hangs over a people and a Nation of which I think they have no intelligent understanding. This is simply not so, and all the diplomats of all the nations will tell it in vain to an unbelieving world.

The people have not forgotten that, in the face of a world of nations armed to the teeth, Presidents Cleveland and Roosevelt made the hand of this Nation felt in matters much more potential and pregnant with danger than this matter can be, and that without war. Nor have they forgotten that Mr. Webster did not fear to undertake exactly the same thing.

Now, as to the question whether the resolution is properly withheld from the House by reason of any conviction on the part of the committee or its chairman that it is useless, ineffective, or impractical. It was introduced at the request of the only organization of gentlemen that has this question immediately in hand. This organization must enjoy in the largest measure the confidence of that class of the American public whose minds and souls are big enough and whose numbers are sufficient to reflect the character of America as a Christian nation. These people have contributed, as the hearing shows, more than $63,000,000 since the armistice for the relief of Armenian suffering, to be applied through the agency of this society. Stronger evidences of public confidence could hardly be asked for. The officers of this society and their helpers have concentrated their conclusions upon the idea expressed in the statement of President Smith, as follows:

Now, what can you do, you ask me, gentlemen, in frankness. Is it to commit the United States Government to a change in its traditional policy? Not at all. We do not ask that. What I ask you to do is to set the seal of your approval upon the majority sentiment of the American people; that they look with anxiety and with the most marked disapproval upon this do-nothing policy of European powers.

Mr. COCKRAN. Supposing you get this resolution through for Executive action, what definite action can the powers, or any of them, take?

Mr. SMITH. In my humble judgment, and I think the recent epoch-making events of the conference in Washington prove it all, all the armies in the world and all the navies in the world are not as strong as the moral influence of the world. The favorable sentiment of the American people is the best asset that any nation can have in the world to-day. It seems to me if the properly accredited representative of the United States Government—for instance, Admiral Bristol, the American high commissioner in Constantinople—were dispatched to Mustapha Kemal Pasha and told to say to him that the further destruction of Christian lives and property under his jurisdiction would be sternly punished, it seems to me it would stop in a moment. I can not doubt that the civilization of the world to-day depends upon the wisdom and statesmanship of the leaders of the American people, and if we fall back into the same cynical selfishness that has brought ruin on Europe, the civilization of the world may not be lost, but it is largely impaired. We come to you gentlemen asking not for a dollar of money or a gun or a bayonet, but we ask you as representatives of the American people to express officially what has been expressed unofficially from San Francisco to New York and from Portland, Me., to New Orleans.

From Secretary Montgomery I quote as follows:

If Congress would accept the resolution, we feel that it would be tremendously effective, because the great thing is to bring about an agreement among the European powers—Great Britain, France, and Italy.

As has been pointed out by Mr. Smith, and I think by some of the members of the committee, it is a fact that it is a disagreement among the powers that perpetuates the present condition and will continue the present condition, unless influence should come in from the outside, from the United States, as suggested here. We do not ask the United States to call the conference but simply to take up with Great Britain, France, and Italy the question of calling a conference. It becomes an offer of good will, of the use of good offices. If it could go so far that the conference would be called, the mere presence of the United States in that conference would serve to bring about a different attitude on the part of some of those powers. The mere use of its good offices by the United States would do a great deal toward settling in a right way the Near East matters. A European statesman who is in a position to know all the currents of European politics writes in a recent letter: "I am not in a position to judge whether there is the slightest hope of the American Government's intervening to assist all the devoted work which so many American subjects have carried on in Asia Minor. I believe that a decided action by Washington would change the whole situation in the most startling manner. I fear that I do not see what else could do so.

From Rev. Mr. Kalaidjian:

We appeal to you because the destiny of a Christian nation and the extinction or revival of Christian civilization in Armenia will depend on America raising its voice in behalf of Armenia, and I believe it will be heard in the chancelleries of Europe and bear good results. This morning in reading the paper I read that the foreign ministers have a conference in the Near East on the 20th of this month.

If this Congress should pass a resolution and the executive branch of the Government could participate in that conference, I am sure, without a battleship, without spending a dollar of American money, without any soldiers, our moral influence will be enough to bring harmony and union among the allied powers. We have no doubt that if Congress will adopt this resolution the Armenians will live and have a new lease of life.

Says Mr. Secretary Vickery:

I would rather have traveled through central Anatolia with the protection of American citizenship papers than to travel with a bodyguard of soldiers of any other country. I have this feeling about the thing. I am not in favor of any armed intervention. I do not think armed intervention is necessary. I said in 1919 a person could have traveled anywhere in Turkey with no other or better protection than American citizenship, but I believe that if to-day the so-called great powers, the civilized powers, including America, would agree on what is right and say these are rights approved by international law and we propose to stand by the principles of international law, that without the firing of a gun or the loss of a drop of blood this whole thing could be righted by moral force, economic forces, commercial forces, and diplomatic procedure. It requires somebody who will stand for what is right.

I am not authorized to express the opinion of any member of the committee, but I draw my own deductions favorable to this resolution as to some of them from questions submitted to the witnesses. First is that of Mr. MOORE of Virginia, whose opinion stands in value second to none among the membership of this House:

Mr. MOORE. To be specific in this resolution, as I understand it, there is no expression for the employment of force ultimately, but what you desire is to enlist the persuasive influence of this Government?

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. MOORE. Exactly as that influence was exerted in the House of Representatives under the leadership of Mr. Webster when it passed the resolution with reference to the situation then existing in Greece. In that situation the Greeks were being oppressed and murdered by the Turks.

After some colloquy, Mr. MOORE says:

Mr. MOORE. The point I am making is this, that the House of Representatives has never hesitated to express itself with reference to such a condition as exists now in Armenia. You are not asking for any independent action by the House or Congress. You are only asking the House of Representatives to pass a resolution bringing this matter in a respectful way to the attention of the executive department.

From interrogatories by Mr. COOPER, of the committee:

Mr. COOPER. Is it not true that the indignant protests, a forceful protest of the American people, supposedly the most independent and most powerful and most disinterested on this question of any in the world, sent to European officials, without any threat of physical force in contemplation, would have a tremendous effect in rousing public sentiment in continental Europe on that question?

Mr. SMITH. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. COOPER. And no Government over there can withstand public opinion any more than our Government?

Mr. SMITH. Absolutely not.

Mr. COOPER. Now, then, if this would do or tend to accomplish that, would it not be a very beneficent purpose to attempt?

Mr. SMITH. At any rate, it would be doing all that we can do at this time.

Here are expressions of the purpose of this resolution and of opinions as to its utility, proceeding from a source which must commend it to a respectful consideration, and if I am not misinterpreting the mental drift of members of the committee, there is respectable sentiment on the committee favorable to the disposition of the resolution and believing in its effectiveness. And yet the coffin lid of hope is nailed upon it for more than 90 days. Mr. Chairman, this is not a quarreling nor a faultfinding speech. "What private griefs men have, I know not," and what honest opinions men entertain are only for me to respect, but I am not to agree with them nor surrender to them nor fail to protest against them when they infringe my own and the moral sensibilities of the world, and that the withholding of this resolution, the failure to report, the failure of the State Department to respond in a proper and an effective way, which I know it can do, to the righteous demands of the Christian people of the Nation, do offend the moral sensibilities of the world, I do not for a moment doubt. The only position, so far as I can know, of this Government in this matter is set out in the following:

[For the press.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 3, 1922.

ANATOLIA.

The Secretary of State to-day announced that the United States Government is prepared to join in a proposed investigation of the reports relating to the deportation of Christian minorities in Anatolia and the alleged atrocities connected therewith. The Secretary of State made the following statement:

"On May 15, 1922, a note was received from the British ambassador referring to reports of the renewal of the deportation of Christians by the Turkish authorities at Angora, and the alleged atrocities connected therewith, and communicating a proposal of the British Government that the American, British, French, and Italian Governments should at once depute carefully selected officers to proceed to such places in Anatolia as might best enable them to conduct an appropriate investigation.

"In a subsequent memorandum of May 19 the British ambassador indicated that the Turkish deportations and outrages might lead to retaliatory action in territory held by the Greek forces and suggested that the Government of the United States should join in requesting the authorities functioning in Greece to permit the dispatch of officers to regions under Greek occupation.

"In answering these communications the Secretary of State has said that the situation of the Christian minorities in Turkey has enlisted to a marked degree the sympathies of the American people and it has been noted with deep concern that the work of benevolent and educational institutions in Turkey has steadily been hampered, that the rights which American citizens have long enjoyed in Turkey in common with the nationals of other powers have often been disregarded and the property rights and interests of Americans and other foreigners placed in jeopardy.

"In view of the humanitarian considerations which are involved and of the desire of this Government to have adequate information through a thorough and impartial investigation of the actual conditions prevailing in Anatolia, in order that this Government may determine its future policy in relation to the authorities concerned, the President is prepared to designate an officer or officers to take part in the proposed inquiry.

"In informing the British Government of the foregoing the Government of the United States has made it clear that the proposed action is limited in scope to an inquiry to obtain accurate data as to the situation in Anatolia for the information of the Governments participating therein and has stated that this Government assumes no further obligation and enters into no commitment.

"In order to expedite the inquiry it was at the same time suggested by this Government that officers should be designated by the respective Governments to institute inquiries concurrently in the districts respectively under Greek and Turkish occupation, and that these two commissions, upon the completion of their investigation, should unite in a comprehensive report."

If anything in human life, official or unofficial, can be more pitiably weak, impotent, and ineffective than this response it is hard to conceive of it. The agreement to designate an officer to take part in an inquiry is sapped of all its vitality and vigor by the emphatic assurance—that this Government assumes no further obligation and enters into no commitment.

Certainly the President sees hobgoblins, ghosts, and demons. With him and the Secretary of State—

'Tis now the very witching time of night, when churchyards yawn and witches walk and bandogs howl and hell itself breathes out contagion to the world.

If the world is this full of ghosts, it is not known outside the State Department.

For nearly 400 years Armenia has been the object of the affectionate sympathy of the Christian world, and naturally so. Its persecutions commenced to horrify the world during the fourteenth century. At its highest peak in its history it represented a population of 20,000,000. Decimation, persecution, murder, and rapine have so depleted its ranks and scattered them to the four winds of the heavens that 3,000,000 souls are about all that can be found on the face of the earth to-day. The last six years, three of war and three of nominal peace—and three times more in the latter—have witnessed the butchery and destruction of a million five hundred thousand of them. They are a wonderful people—the superior of all the Asiatic and eastern European peoples industrially, intellectually, and religiously. They have always made valuable additions to American citizenship and assimilated the principles of our Government with remarkable adaptitude. They have always been intuitively Christian. The world storms of paganism and Mohammedism have swept over and around them in vain. Like a consecrated sentinel they have stood through the Dark Ages of a dark continent, holding high the cross. Out of this wonderful history of Christian loyalty, coming down the corridors of time from the very feet of the apostles, there is handed down a beautiful tradition, of which I had never heard until I saw mention of it by one of the witnesses in the hearings to which I have above referred. I think it ought to be more generally known, whether accepted or not. Mr. Montgomery said:

Armenia was the first nation officially to adopt Christianity, with all that that act involved in a pagan world. Dickran was King of Armenia and was supposed to have been in Urfa, and in a letter he sent an invitation to the Christ, when he knew that He was being persecuted in Jerusalem, to come up there and take refuge, or at least to visit them. The reply of Christ was that it was impossible for Him to come, but that He would arrange to send some of His disciples up there. That was in the year 31 A. D.

Mr. Chairman, whether this tradition is true or not its existence shows the record of Christian loyalty through all the long history of the nation. If, sir, there is a spiritual life there is a spiritual accountability, and if a spiritual accountability there is a spiritual responsibility, and if it is individual it is no less collective. If men live by it and die by it then nations stand by it and fall by it. That responsibility, as sure as we live to-day, is enjoined upon this Government of ours to come out in the open light of day before the open eyes of an anxious world and intervene in behalf of murdered Christianity. If the Christ to which the beautiful tradition attaches lives to-day, as we believe He does, He enjoins that responsibility on this Government, but it can not be doubted that between Him and the Armenians somewhere the connecting cord of human responsibility is broken, and for myself I believe it is broken here in Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely opposed to the policy of the United States Shipping Board in permitting the sale of intoxicating liquors on American ships. We are told that the present Shipping Board has inherited this policy from their predecessors, but I believe this practice should be stopped. When the merchant marine bill comes before the House I shall support an amendment to the bill which will make it illegal beyond question to sell liquor on vessels operated under the American flag.

The continuation of the present policy does, in my opinion, justify the charge that "Uncle Sam" is engaged in bootlegging. Our Constitution prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquor within the United States and its Territories, and yet we have the disgraceful condition of our Government-owned ships sailing under the protection of our flag, upon which the spirit, if not the letter, of the constituted law of the land is being openly violated. Is it any wonder that the people of Europe say that Americans are not sincere in their efforts to enforce prohibition, when they observe the spirit of the Constitution being violated on our own Government-owned ships?

No one will deny that the lawbreaker and bootlegger in our own land will be encouraged to carry on his work by reason of the policy of the Shipping Board, for it places the Government in the position of admitting its inability or unwillingness to enforce its own laws. Our Government can not afford to permit this condition to continue, and the Shipping Board has no more right to permit liquor to be sold on Government-owned ships operated under the American flag than the moonshiner and bootlegger at home has to dispense his poison bootleg whisky and raisin jack. The law of our land should follow our flag wherever it goes, whether on land or sea. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk for a minute this morning and direct the attention of this committee to what is being done with the subject on which we very emphatically expressed ourselves when the tariff bill passed this House. It will be remembered that in Committee of the Whole we adopted an amendment placing a tariff on hides. Then the proposition was made to place what was called a compensatory duty on shoes and other manufactured leather products. That was defeated, and then the tariff on hides when we came back into the House was defeated, because the leather manufacturers were determined to have compensation if they had to carry a tariff on hides. What has been done?

The other body has reported, and I understand it passed, a portion of the bill placing on the hides of cattle of the bovine species 2 cents per pound. Take a 30-pound hide, and 2 cents a pound is 60 cents. Now, it was stated here in the debate in the committee that a 30-pound hide makes 10 pairs of shoes. That is 6 cents a pair of shoes, is it not? If you put 60 cents on a hide that will make 10 pairs of shoes, that makes 6 cents on a pair of shoes. Let us see what they do for the fellow that makes the shoes and the fellow that wears them. It says:

Boots and shoes, made wholly or in chief value of leather made of hides of cattle of the bovine species, 12 cents per pair and 5 per cent ad valorem.

Every time you put 6 cents on raw material that a manufacturer of leather goods uses he wants 12 cents on his product, and that is what he is getting. You put 6 cents on the hide that goes into a pair of shoes and they put 12 cents on the shoes, but they do not stop there. They want to be dead sure they get the worth of the money. Twelve cents a pair and 5 per cent ad valorem. Here is the farmer who plows and wears brogans. He goes to buy them, and they say they are $3, and they add 12 cents and then 5 per cent ad valorem, which is 5 per cent of $3. Fifteen cents and 12 cents make 27 cents. In other words, they add 9 per cent to the price of his shoes; that is, the farmer who plows and wears a cheap shoe. Some of us wear $12 shoes. I have had to pay that for mine, but I dislike to admit it. There are lots of people who pay more. But take a $12 shoe. They add 12 cents and then 5 per cent, which is 60 cents, and which is the total of 72 cents to his shoes, which is 6 per cent of the price. In other words, 6 per cent is added to the price for a man who wears expensive shoes, and 9 per cent to the price for the fellow who works in the trench or plows in the field. You can very readily see where they land. Of course on the cheap shoe they pay but 6 cents in the tariff on the hide. They have made 21 cents profit on it.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can not. I know this shoe pinches a man from Massachusetts.

They have put this on, and they go out——

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman is so anxious, I will yield.

Mr. WINSLOW. I want to ask you if you will be kind enough to make a concrete example, based on mathematics, to illustrate what will happen with that 6 cents, and 12 cents, and 5 per cent, because it is pretty difficult for people to understand it in any other form.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman is through, I can give him an illustration. Here is a farmer who wears brogan shoes, and when he goes to buy shoes they add 27 cents to a pair of shoes. That is concrete. That is 9 per cent of the cost. I have added it up, too. I can not do it twice. If you have a man who buys a $12 pair of shoes, they add 60 cents and 12 cents, and they charge the man who buys the shoe 72 cents.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman kindly extend his mathematics concretely in the RECORD?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will do it. I never have run away from a statement that I made on the floor of the House. If the gentleman can not understand it, I can not furnish him with understanding. Here is what the proposition is. Here is a man that buys cheap shoes, and he has got to pay a higher rate in the shape of a tariff tax than the man who buys the higher priced shoes. Are you going to meet some of your people that way this fall? If so, I would like to meet you jointly on the proposition. This is a discrimination between the poor man and the rich man, and you can not get away from it. Let us see what you propose to have. On a $12 pair of shoes they pay 6 cents tariff on the hide, according to the statement made here. On the plea of getting a compensatory duty they have added 72 cents, being 66 cents to the profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of the Panama Canal Act, approved August 24, 1912, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That the Governor of the Panama Canal shall, in connection with the operation of such canal, have official control and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone and shall perform all duties in connection with the civil government of the Canal Zone, which is to be held, treated, and governed as an adjunct of such Panama Canal. Unless in this act otherwise provided, all existing laws of the Canal Zone referring to the civil governor or the civil administration of the Canal Zone shall be applicable to the Governor of the Panama Canal, who shall perform all such executive and administrative duties required by existing law. The President is authorized to determine or cause to be determined what towns shall exist in the Canal Zone and subdivide and from time to time resubdivide said Canal Zone into subdivisions, to be designated by name or number, so that there shall be situated one town in each subdivision, and the boundaries of each subdivision shall be clearly defined. In each town there shall be a magistrate's court with exclusive original jurisdiction coextensive with the subdivision in which it is situated of all civil cases in which the principal sum claimed does not exceed $300, and all criminal cases wherein the punishment that may be imposed shall not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment exceeding 30 days, or both, and all violations of police regulations and ordinances and all actions involving possession or title to personal property or the forcible entry and detainer of real estate. Such magistrates shall also hold preliminary investigations in charges of felony and offenses under section 10 of this act and charges of misdemeanor in which the punishment that may be imposed is beyond the jurisdiction herein granted to the magistrate courts, and commit or bail in bailable cases to the district court. A sufficient number of magistrates and constables, who must be citizens of the United States, to conduct the business of such courts shall be appointed by the Governor of the Panama Canal for terms of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by law regulate the same. The rules governing said courts and prescribing the duties of said magistrates and constables, oaths and bonds, the times and places of holding such courts, the disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcements of judgments, providing for appeals therefrom to the district court, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of convicts shall be established by order of the President. The Governor of the Panama Canal shall appoint all notaries public, prescribe their powers and duties, their official seal, and the fees to be charged and collected by them.

"Appeals in civil and criminal cases are hereby authorized from the judgments and rulings of the magistrate courts to the district court under the rules and regulations prescribed by section 6 of Executive order of March 12, 1914, relating to the Canal Zone judiciary: Provided, however, That there shall be no right of appeal in criminal cases, except in those cases wherein the defendant has been sentenced to jail or has been fined in amount exceeding $25."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] a question or two relative to the hearings on this bill. I have the hearings that are supposed to be all the hearings, at least all that I could get from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and which purport to be on H. R. 8409. I notice in the gentleman's report that a number of bills heretofore reported to the House on the same subject matter refer to the hearings set out in this pamphlet that I hold in my hand. In this pamphlet I notice that the district attorney of the Canal Zone comes before the committee and explains the provision of H. R. 4809, which was introduced long before this bill was introduced and contains no provision in it about the abolishment of the United States marshal's office in Panama. I notice further that a letter there by Secretary Weeks does not refer in any way, although it discusses the bill in detail, to the subject of abolishing the United States marshal. And then, in the hearings we find the statement by Governor Morrow, favoring the bill, and it does not say anything about the abolishment of the United States marshal's office. Outside of the testimony of the district attorney and the statement of Governor Morrow, I do not find anything of any value so far as the hearings are concerned. Now, as to the bill containing the provision that would abolish the United States marshal, what witnesses, if any, came before the committee and testified?

Mr. DENISON. Well, Mr. Chairman, of course the provision in regard to the United States marshal does not appear in this particular section of the bill. I would not want to go into a discussion of that question at this time. I would prefer that the gentleman postpone that question about the marshalship until we reach the provision of the bill relating to it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It has a bearing upon the subject matter in this section. The things taken up in this section were taken up in the hearings, and yet nothing was said in those hearings in regard to the abolishment of the United States marshal. What witnesses appeared before the committee advocating the abolition of the United States marshal's office?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, of course, I have explained this matter to my friend from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] privately, but if he wants me to explain it in the RECORD, as he doubtless does——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Certainly; I want the Members to understand it.

Mr. DENISON. In the beginning of this session I filed a bill, known as H. R. 4809, which covers part of the subject matter of the pending bill. During the former Congress there were several bills filed by the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, and I remember that two of them particularly were filed by Mr. Esch, then the chairman of the committee. These bills were filed and hearings held on them by the committee.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Neither one of them contained this provision, did it?

Mr. DENISON. Hearings were held on them by the committee, and they were ordered reported to the House. That was near the close of the former Congress. But they were not reached, and Congress adjourned. Then, in the beginning of this Congress, Mr. Esch not being on the committee any longer, similar bills were filed by myself upon this subject, amending the Panama Canal act and other legislative acts relating to the Canal Zone.

Now, afterwards it became advisable, in my judgment, to have a new bill to take the place of H. R. 4809, in view of the hearings we had on that bill, so as to include in the legislation certain changes which the committee had decided upon after the hearings on H. R. 4809.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will yield further, I will continue my statement.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would answer the question I asked him.

Mr. DENISON. There were four bills pending, and the committee had before it the hearings on former similar bills, and we did not feel justified in asking that the witnesses should come to the United States from Panama to testify upon a matter on which they had already testified before the same committee, so that the committee used those hearings on the former bills and the information which the various members of the committee had gotten personally when visiting on the Canal Zone.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. What witnesses?

Mr. DENISON. One of them was Governor Harding. He was the former Governor of the Canal Zone. I do not know who they all were now, but at any rate the committee had those hearings before them, and the committee thought that they had sufficient information to enable them to act upon these bills.

Now, in addition to the testimony of Governor Harding we had communications from the present governor, and we had communications from the present Secretary of War, who is charged with the administration of affairs in Panama. Now, let me state for the benefit of my friend from Indiana that in none of these bills was there any provision about abolishing the office of marshal, but after we had concluded the hearings and after those bills had been reported the Secretary of War called our attention to the fact that a special investigating committee had made an investigation of the Canal Zone and had recommended that this office of marshal be abolished. Therefore he sent a communication to the chairman of the committee and asked that one of the bills be amended so as to make that provision.

Then, when the time came recently to take up these Panama bills, as I explained the other day when we had the bill up for consideration, as a matter of expediency it was decided by the committee to combine all four of the bills in one, and in doing that we embodied in the combined bill the provision with reference to the marshal as it had been recommended and urged by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Then, you had no one suggesting the advisability of abolishing the office of United States marshal in Panama except the letter of the Secretary of War. Is that right?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I have made my statement, and I thought I had made it very clear. I do not intend to discuss that question further now, but will do so when we come to it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The gentleman refuses to answer that question. Will the gentleman answer another one? The Federal judge of the zone has been here recently. Did you ask him anything relative to the abolition of the office of United States marshal in Panama? Did you ask him concerning it? Did he testify?

Mr. DENISON. He did not.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Did you ask him anything on the subject?

Mr. DENISON. I am not testifying now.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The district attorney of the Panama Canal was here, was he not? Did you ask him anything about this subject? No; and he did not testify anything on the subject at all. The Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Daugherty, appointed the United States marshal. Did you inquire if he was in favor of having the office abolished? The gentleman does not answer.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman in favor of discharging this marshal because Mr. Daugherty appointed him?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am in favor of consulting the man who appointed him, when he is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. It is shown here that the Secretary of War wrote a letter to abolish the office. They have it in the bill. Of course, there were military fellows about him, and the men who went down there to make an investigation recommended the discontinuance of the marshalship, and that man who was the master mind of the commission was General Connor, and you know that there is a Bourbon military man who has the military notion on all subjects.

Mr. WINGO. What reason does the Secretary of War give for wanting to abolish the office of the marshal?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. He says the police can do it, and that they have not much to do, and that they can appoint deputies. They will have enough additional policemen down there to more than treble the amount of salary paid. But why not have a United States marshal down there to carry out the edicts and orders of the Federal court?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 8 of the Panama Canal act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That there shall be in the Canal Zone one district court with two divisions, one including Balboa and the other including Cristobal; and one district judge of the said district, who shall hold his court in both divisions at such time as he may designate by order, at least once a month in each division. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed, amended, or repealed by order of the President.

"(b) The said district court shall have jurisdiction of—

"All felony cases under the laws of the Canal Zone;

"All offenses arising under section 10 of this act;

"All cases in equity;

"All cases in admiralty;

"All cases of divorce and annulment of marriage;
"All cases at law involving principal sums exceeding $300;
"All appeals from judgments rendered in the magistrates' courts;
"All matters and proceedings not otherwise provided for which at the time this act took effect were within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, the Circuit Court of the Canal Zone, the District Court of the Canal Zone, or the judges thereof; and

"In addition to the jurisdiction now specifically conferred on it by certain acts of Congress, the said court shall have jurisdiction of offenses under the criminal laws of the United States when such offenses are committed upon the high seas beyond the territorial limits of the Canal Zone, on vessels belonging in whole or in part to the United States, or any citizen thereof, or any corporation created by or under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof, and the offenders are found in the Canal Zone or are brought into the Canal Zone after the commission of the offense: Provided, That this provision shall not be construed to deprive district courts of the United States of any jurisdiction now provided by law. The procedure and practice in such cases shall be the same as in other criminal cases tried under the laws of the Canal Zone.

"The jurisdiction in admiralty herein conferred upon the district judge and the district court shall be the same as is exercised by the United States district judges and the United States district courts, and the practice and procedure shall be the same as in the United States district courts.

"(c) The judge of the district court shall provide for the selection, summoning, and serving of jurors from among the citizens of the United States, subject to jury duty, to serve in the division of the district in which such jurors reside; and a jury shall be had in any civil or criminal case originating in said court on the demand of either party. The compensation of jurors shall be prescribed by order of the President.

"(d) The said district judge shall receive the same salary as is allowed to United States district judges, and when holding court away from home shall be allowed the same mileage and per diem as is allowed to United States district judges; he shall appoint the clerk of said court, and may appoint one assistant clerk and such other additional help as the President may authorize; all of such officials and help shall receive such compensation as shall be prescribed by order of the President.

"(e) During the absence of the district judge or during any period of disability or disqualification from sickness or otherwise to discharge his duties, the same shall be temporarily performed by a special judge, to be designated by the President, which designation may be made by cablegram or otherwise, and who shall be an attorney at law qualified to practice before the courts of the Canal Zone or any of the United States district courts or any of the superior courts of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, and who during such service shall be paid at the same rate of compensation and the same mileage and per diem as that paid the district judge of the Canal Zone.

"(f) There shall be a district attorney for said court, who shall be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum.

"It shall be the duty of the district attorney to conduct all legal proceedings, civil and criminal, for the Government, and to advise the Governor of the Panama Canal on all legal questions touching the operation of the canal and the administration of civil affairs.

"Effective 60 days from the passage of this act the position of marshal is hereby discontinued, and the duties of marshal of said court shall be performed by the chief of police of the Canal Zone, and such members of his force as he may deputize for that purpose, with the approval of the court.

"It shall be the duty of the chief of police, and his deputies designated for that purpose, to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things usually incident to the office of marshal.

"(g) The district judge and the district attorney shall be appointed by the President, as heretofore, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of four years each, and until their successors are appointed and qualified; they shall reside within the Canal Zone during their term of office, and shall be allowed six weeks' leave of absence each year with pay, under such regulations as the President may from time to time prescribe."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the course of general debate there was reference made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD] to Armenia. I suppose there is no Member of this House who does not share the feeling that the conditions in Armenia and the plight of the Armenians present one of the most lamentable and deplorable things to be found anywhere in the history of civilization, and certainly the most lamentable and deplorable condition existing anywhere in the world to-day. The gentleman from North Carolina alluded to the fact that some months ago I had introduced a resolution on the subject of Armenia, and regretted the fact that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had not taken affirmative and favorable action on the resolution, or something like it.

I did introduce such a resolution, and hearings have been held thereon. At those hearings many facts of importance as to conditions in Armenia and the Near East were brought out. At the time when the Committee on Foreign Affairs was very seriously considering whether a report of some kind should be made we learned, as it was our business to learn, that the executive branch of the Government was directly interesting itself in the Armenian question, and hoped in some tangible and specific way to show that interest. I suppose that we should all agree that this problem is primarily and in the first instance an executive rather than a legislative one; that is, these questions involve the conduct of the foreign relations of the United States and must be dealt with from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, in most cases, and perhaps in all cases, rather than at this end of the Avenue. In my judgment the Congress of the United States is pretty apt to make a grievous mistake when it undertakes to dabble in international questions of this general character—resolutions of sympathy and the like. They properly belong to the Executive.

So when the Committee on Foreign Affairs learned of the program of the Executive it suspended its operations; while it has not taken any action and will not take any negative action on the resolution, it will probably take no favorable action.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman introduced the resolution, which meant the assumption that Congress might very properly act, and that was done last year. The hearings were completed, as I recollect, on the 7th of March. I may say in commenting on the last remarks of the gentleman that the committee has never heard that there has been any suspension of the purpose to go on to a final conclusion, and certainly the minority members never have heard of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I will say frankly that there has been no formal action looking toward suspension. I thought and a good many thought, as I am advised—and certainly there was no partisan element in the question—that if the State Department was to be active concerning the Armenian question there was not the same occasion for us in Congress to proceed.

It is with reference to the program of the Department of State that I wish to address myself for a moment. The Secretary of State on the 3d of this month gave out a statement to the press concerning his program and the administration's program in reference to Armenia. That statement in substance announced that the American Government was to join with the other principal Governments of the world in deputing carefully selected officers to proceed to the Near East and to find out for themselves what the conditions were. That is not going very far, perhaps, but it makes a start in getting the information upon which the American Government could then base appropriate action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the Hughes statement and an exchange of letters between the Secretary of State and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. The statement is not a long one, and I think it is exceedingly important in itself. My impression is that it did not receive the attention in the press that its consequence seemed to warrant. At all events, Mr. Chairman, I have been receiving since that time, and as I am informed my colleagues have been receiving since that time, letters which would indicate that while the American people are vitally interested in the welfare of the Armenians they have not been aware of the definite steps taken by the Secretary of State. Believing, as I did, that it might be well to have amplified the views of the department and the administration on this matter, I wrote to the Secretary of State on June 7 as follows:

JUNE 7, 1922.

Hon. CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am receiving daily many letters from people of high standing who are much concerned over the Armenia situation and are of the opinion that positive action of some kind should be undertaken by the United States.

I think it is not generally realized that you have accepted an invitation extended by Great Britain to investigate conditions in Asia Minor. Those who know the fact seem unaware of the extent of the commitment and of the nature of the results likely to follow. Will you not be good enough to write me indicating the administration view and plans with respect to Armenia, with especial reference to the above-mentioned investigation?

Sincerely yours,
JOHN JACOB ROGERS.

The Secretary of State has just replied and has sent me a press copy of the statement of June 3, to which I have already referred and which I will print with my remarks.

The letter of transmittal adds little or nothing to the previous statement, but for the information of Members of the House I will read it. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 14, 1922.

The Hon. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your recent communication with reference to the situation of the Christian minorities in Turkey.

In reply, I beg to inform you that the President has decided to designate officers to cooperate with officers selected by the British, French, and Italian Governments in investigating reports which have been received of deportations and alleged atrocities committed against the Christian minorities of Asia Minor.

For your further information and convenience, there is inclosed a copy of the statement on this subject issued by the department on June 3.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant, CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Inclosure: Statement issued by the Secretary of State on June 3.

I know from personal contact with my fellow Members that they are concerned about Armenia, and that part at least of the reason why they are concerned is because their constituents are deeply concerned and have so indicated to them in their correspondence. It seemed to me that it might, therefore, be of some convenience to Members of the House if they had available in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the situation as it exists to-day. I think that they may be glad to be able to advise their constituents that neither Congress nor the executive branch of the Government is unaware of the gravity of the situation, but is determined to do whatever may appropriately be within the power of the American people to remedy the situation and to put a stop to the atrocities in the Near East so far as they are found to exist. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. To what does the gentleman most attribute the conditions in Armenia and those other Asia Minor Christian peoples?

Mr. ROGERS. I think that they are probably attributable to two major causes. One is the disposition of the Turks toward the peoples of Asia Minor, especially to those of Christian faith, and the other is the rather unfortunate disposition of the problems there which were brought about by the treaty of Sevres.

The following is the statement of the Secretary of State, to which I have already referred:

[For the press.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 3, 1922.

ANATOLIA.

The Secretary of State to-day announced that the United States Government is prepared to join in a proposed investigation of the reports relating to the deportation of Christian minorities in Anatolia and the alleged atrocities connected therewith. The Secretary of State made the following statement:

"On May 15, 1922, a note was received from the British ambassador referring to reports of the renewal of the deportation of Christians by the Turkish authorities at Angora, and the alleged atrocities connected therewith, and communicating a proposal of the British Government that the American, British, French, and Italian Governments should at once depute carefully selected officers to proceed to such places in Anatolia as might best enable them to conduct an appropriate investigation.

"In a subsequent memorandum of May 19 the British ambassador indicated that the Turkish deportations and outrages might lead to retaliatory action in territory held by the Greek forces and suggested that the Government of the United States should join in requesting the authorities functioning in Greece to permit the dispatch of officers to regions under Greek occupation.

"In answering these communications the Secretary of State has said that the situation of the Christian minorities in Turkey has enlisted to a marked degree the sympathies of the American people, and it has been noted with deep concern that the work of benevolent and educational institutions in Turkey has steadily been hampered, that the rights which American citizens have long enjoyed in Turkey in common with the nationals of other powers have often been disregarded and the property rights and interests of Americans and other foreigners placed in jeopardy.

"In view of the humanitarian considerations which are involved and of the desire of this Government to have adequate information through a thorough and impartial investigation of the actual conditions prevailing in Anatolia, in order that this Government may determine its future policy in relation to the authorities concerned, the President is prepared to designate an officer or officers to take part in the proposed inquiry.

"In informing the British Government of the foregoing the Government of the United States has made it clear that the proposed action is limited in scope to an inquiry to obtain accurate data as to the situation in Anatolia for the information of the Governments participating therein and has stated that this Government assumes no further obligation and enters into no commitment.

"In order to expedite the inquiry it was at the same time suggested by this Government that officers should be designated by the respective Governments to institute inquiries concurrently in the districts respectively under Greek and Turkish occupation, and that these two commissions upon the completion of their investigation should unite in a comprehensive report."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-five Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TINCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11872, and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, when 246 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Indiana: After the word "affairs," page 7, line 16, insert the following: "There shall be a marshal for such district, and it shall be the duty of the marshal to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things incident to the office of marshal. The marshal shall be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum."

Strike out all after the word "affairs," in line 16, page 7, to and including line 2, on page 8.

Strike out the word "and" after the word "judge" in line 3, page 8, insert a comma, and add the words "and the marshal" after the word "attorney" in said line.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, that amendment purports to put the United States marshal's status back as it was under the original Panama Canal act. I have taken the act and quoted the language of it in this amendment. I have sought to strike out the part of section 2 as proposed by the bill which puts the duties of the United States marshal in the hands of the chief of police. I spoke the day before yesterday on this subject, and inserted in the RECORD many of the reasons why I felt this action on the part of the House ought not to be taken. I think you will find on very close scrutiny of this bill that there are a great many defects in it. I have been trying to get the gentleman who is the author of the bill to answer some questions concerning his bill, but I have not been able to get very much information out of him. I am going now to yield a part of my time to him to let him answer a few questions: First, has anyone else recommended the repeal of the part of the law creating and paying the salary of the United States marshal except the Secretary of War?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad if the gentleman from Indiana would go ahead and present his case to the House, and I shall make my statement after he is through.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. This is the first time in the history of this House that a man purporting to be the author of a bill refuses to answer plain questions that are pertinent to the bill.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to the gentleman that I shall answer them in my own time.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman were quite fair to the House he would give the information at a time when it may be commented upon. I venture to say that nobody else recommended this provision. The United States district attorney appeared before that committee when this provision was not in the bill. This is the fourth or fifth bill of this kind, and this is the only bill that ever came before the House that had this provision in it. The district judge was here the other day, and he was never asked a word as to whether he was in favor of abolishing this court officer, and the man is in the United States now, and I understand that he is violently opposed to the abolition of his court officer. Why do they not consult him? I will tell you why. Gen. W. D. Connor headed a commission to straighten out the Canal Zone, after the 4th of last March. When he went down there, military man that he is, he undertook to make it more of a military place than it ever was before. God knows the original military act gives more power to the Governor of the Canal Zone than any ruler ever had. He can deport a man without trial and reason, and this bill seeks to give additional authority. I published in the RECORD yesterday a manifesto, a public reprimand of an American citizen, issued by the acting governor in the absence of the governor, where they had brought that American citizen up and examined him and said, "We will let you slip through this time, but don't do it again." This bill seeks to give them more power, this bill seeks to take the jurisdiction from where it is now and put it in the hands of the magistrates' courts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may say that that is not true. I say that it increases the jurisdiction of the magistrates' courts to hear misdemeanors under the liquor laws. They say that the courts are full of liquor cases down there, and why? Because the Federal court tries them under the present law, and they seek to give the hirelings appointed there by this military governor the right to enforce the liquor law. They want more power down there, and they are going to get it if this bill passes. The first attack when they went there was upon the judiciary, the appointment made by Attorney General Daugherty, and I want to say to gentlemen here on this side of the House that the Attorney General is opposed to this proposition.

There is only one person who is asking for this, and that is the Secretary of War, and I venture to say that it was a purely formal matter with him; that he wrote the letter on the request of some Army officer who told him that he could save a little money there. You know how they will save money if they leave it to the Army bunch. They will have a half dozen deputies to do the work of the United States marshal and you will be paying out more money than under existing conditions.

I think this amendment ought to prevail. No man who appeared before the committee advocated the abolition of this office, as far as I am able to find out. I have asked the committee for the hearings. No person has ever asked it except the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have diligently sought to find out if anybody else was interested in having this particular provision in the bill except the Secretary of War and I can not find anyone in favor of it. The commission says that the author of this bill recommended it, and who was the commission? I do not care who the lesser lights were. I know that Gen. W. D. Connor was at the head of it and that it was his mind that controlled the report of the commission.

And that was the report that proposed to stop the appropriations for the health department in eradicating mosquitoes down there until the health rate of the zone equaled the health rate of the United States. That was an asinine demonstration by an Army officer after the great reputation made down there by General Gorgas in making it possible to build that canal by eradicating the mosquito and stopping yellow fever. He goes down there and makes the recommendation to stop the appropriations for that kind of service until the death rate from yellow fever and other diseases on the Canal Zone equals that in other cities. He would have recommended the stopping of the destruction of the yellow-fever germs until the yellow fever got started again.

The acting governor said to this fellow, "You are liable to hurt the reputation of the governor." So he posted his name on the trees. That is military goose step, if you please.

Suppose I said President Harding was a bad President and ought to be kicked out, do you think he would "hoss" me up and reprimand me publicly? He might do it privately, and I would take it, but the American citizen does not have to live under a military heel. But that is what this bill does. It intends to take the power away from the marshal and give it to a militaristic governor. And if you would leave it to the word of the Federal employees down there you would find that 90 per cent of them are in favor of sending the present governor away from the Zone. I say that advisedly.

Who has the author of this bill conferred with in bringing in this bill? If he did not remain as silent as the bones of Job in the valley, I would ask him who brought this bill to him? The military bunch, of course. The United States district attorney says he is in favor of it, but this was before it contained the provision abolishing his marshal. There were other bills introduced, I know. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] introduced a bill changing somewhat the judicial procedure, but there was not a word said in it about abolishing the United States marshal. Who was it that brought it to the chairman of this committee and asked him to abolish the marshalship? I can not find out, except that it was Secretary of War Weeks, and you know that the Secretary of War follows the advice of the Army officers down there. I say there is nobody advocating this except the war lords that want to put more power in their own hands. They have got enough, God knows, down there now.

This is one of the greatest injustices of this bill. There will be a good many more pointed out before we get through with it. I hope at the proper time to move to recommit this monstrous piece of gall and put it back with the committee. There is no doubt there are some things down there that ought to be remedied. For instance, there are the divorce practices. The gentleman from Massachusetts was the first man that called my attenton to it. I have not had a chance to go over it very much. You have provisions in this bill under which almost any man in this House could be divorced. It will be a divorce haven down there. My friend from Illinois, TOM WILLIAMS, says he believed the gentleman from Illinois had it put in there for the benefit of old bachelors. [Laughter.] I do not think that is so. They simply wrote it up and gave it to him. I do not believe he is in favor of that liberal law in favor of divorces, and I believe if he thought of it long enough he would not be in favor of abolishing the United States marshal and appointing deputy policemen to do the bidding of the military autocrat down there. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. Gentlemen, we have before us in this amendment one of the clearest illustrations of the difficulty of abolishing a job. Here is one of the best examples we have had in the Congress since I have been a Member, of the fuss that can be raised, and the smoke screen that can be thrown out, and the noise that can be had, when Congress undertakes to abolish a useless job and save the Treasury a few thousand dollars.

Now, if this bill had not contained the simple provision of doing away with the office of a marshal on the Canal Zone, my friend from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] would have said it was a fine bill; but because it contains that provision he attacks other provisions of the bill. Now, all of this talk, gentlemen, about militarism, military autocracy, and military rule should not fool you. That is all a smoke screen. That is simply thrown out in order to create a certain kind of prejudice. What for? To get you to save this office of United States marshal.

I want to make this confession. When this bill was filed, or when this provision was put in the bill, I did not know where the United States marshal was from. I did not know he was a personal friend and political manager of my friend from Indiana. I did not know that at all, and I perhaps do not blame him for feeling that he would like to have him continue on his job. But here is the difference between our two positions. He is speaking to try to save a job for a friend of his; I am speaking in the interest of the Government. That question is put squarely to the House to-day. I am trying to represent the policy of economy of the present administration. My friend is trying to save a job for his friend.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I have not the time.

I want to explain how it came to be recommended. Before the present administration came in Secretary Baker sent an able inspector down to make an investigation of conditions on the Canal Zone. He made his report just before the last administration went out, and then when the present administration came in the report of that investigator was found; the Secretary of War decided he would make a further investigation, so he appointed a commission, with the approval of the President, to go down to the Canal Zone and make a thorough investigation of conditions down there. My friend says it was a military commission. Of course he made an inaccurate statement. There was one military man on the commission and three civilians.

General Connor was chairman of it. He has been since the war the chief of the Transportation Department of the Army. He is a man of great ability, and said to be one of the ablest men in the Army on the subject of transportation. He served valiantly in France in connection with transportation and supplies during the recent war. Now, that may discredit him with some of the Members, but I am giving you the facts for what they are worth. He was chairman of the commission. Another man on that commission was Mr. A. B. Fry, who was formerly connected with the Naval Reserves, and is now connected with the Treasury Department, and during the Spanish-American War was associated with Secretary Weeks in connection with the Naval Militia; he is now a supervising engineer in New York, and is a man of unusual ability, so the papers stated at the time of his appointment. And I have that information from other sources. Another man on the commission was Mr. F. A. Molitor, who was a railroad and civil engineer of great ability, and another man is H. P. Wilson, president of the Western Power Co. of California, and considered one of the highest authorities in the United States on inland waterways, and is a man of great administrative ability. The Secretary picked the very best men he could find. They went down and made an investigation of the Canal Zone, and, among other things, they made this recommendation to the President:

The court system of the Canal Zone consists of one district court and two magistrate courts. There is a United States district attorney and a United States marshal, who has a deputy marshal. After full consultation and consideration the commission is of the opinion that the duties of marshal can be performed by the present chief of police.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONDON. Is there any way of providing that the chief of police should come from the district of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the Congress might put that in if it wishes to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this is no time for joking. I want some figures. Will the gentleman please state to us how much service the marshal has to perform down there in that little court? I am interested in knowing.

Mr. DENISON. I will try to do so.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Did you consult the Attorney General? Was he, as a part of this administration, in favor of doing away with this job?

Mr. DENISON. I did not.

Now, when we got ready to report this bill to the House—and, as I stated the other day, this bill was reported recently, and it is simply a combination of four other bills that were on the calendar—the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, sent a communication to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], the chairman of the committee, and I want to read it to you. I read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 15, 1922.

Hon. SAMUEL E. WINSLOW,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The special Panama Canal commission appointed by me last year recommended, among other things, that the position of marshal of the Canal Zone be abolished and the duties transferred to the chief of police of the Canal Zone. The matter of making this change was first taken up with the Attorney General, and he advised me that the Panama Canal act clearly prohibited the proposed action, which could only be attained, in his opinion, by additional legislation by Congress. The Governor of the Panama Canal concurred in the recommendation of the special commission, and as there will be a saving to the United States Government if this position is abolished, I recommend that the necessary legislation be enacted. In this connection I would invite your attention to a bill now pending before the House of Representatives (H. R. 9022) to amend sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Panama Canal act, and for other purposes, and would suggest that, as section 8 originally required the appointment of a marshal, suitable amendments be added to the bill along the lines indicated below, in order to accomplish the object mentioned in the foregoing.

Then he goes ahead and suggests the amendments to be made to the bill then pending in the House in order to bring about this result. He says:

I hope that your committee will consent to the proposed amendments to this bill, and, as the legislation contemplated by the entire bill is of considerable importance to the Panama Canal, I would appreciate it if action thereon by the House of Representatives could be expedited as much as possible.

Now, there is the recommendation of the President's representative. He says he consulted the Attorney General. He thought he would have the right under the law to abolish the office of marshal himself and transfer the duties to the chief of police, but upon consultation with the Attorney General he was told that it was a matter of law, and that the law would have to be amended, and thereupon the Secretary comes to a committee of the House and recommends that this legislation be enacted.

We have one court on the Canal Zone with two districts. We have heretofore had a marshal for that court. We have also had a chief of police for the Canal Zone. Their territories are identical. The chief of police is a police officer, and he has numerous policemen under him. We have this office of marshal for the same territory as that covered by the chief of police. His duties are what? To keep attendance on the court and to serve process in the Canal Zone. It has been ascertained by this commission and others down there that the office of marshal is a wholly useless one, and as a matter of fact, gentlemen of the House, it is a perfectly useless one. The Government furnishes the marshal with a mansion to live in free and $5,000 salary, and he does not do anything except to live comfortably. Now, that is a very nice thing; it is a very nice thing indeed; but the time comes now and then when we must look after the interest of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the marshal has nothing to do, what is the court doing? He acts on the process of the court. What is the use of the court?

Mr. DENISON. The marshal theoretically has something to do, but practically he does it through his deputies. Now, that work might just as well be done through the chief of police. We have a chief of police there, with his deputies, and the bill says that the duties heretofore performed by the marshal shall hereafter be performed by the chief of police through such deputies as he may select with the approval of the court.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand, he proposes to abolish the office of marshal and confer his duties upon the chief of police of the Canal Zone?

Mr. DENISON. Exactly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the canal act creating the government of the zone confer that authority upon the chief of police, or would it require remedial legislation to relieve the marshal of those duties?

Mr. DENISON. This act transfers the duties of marshal to the chief of police.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. What saving would there be?

Mr. DENISON. We have these two sets of officers, the chief of police and his deputies and the marshal and his deputies. One set of officials could do all the work without any inconvenience or any additional expense.

Mr. LAYTON. How many deputies has the marshal?

Mr. DENISON. I am told that the salary and expenses of the marshal's office amount to $10,000 a year. The man who occupies the position of chief of police is a civilian living on the Canal Zone, and he is a very efficient man. He has been there since 1906. By this act we transfer the duties of the marshal and his deputies to the chief of police, and he with the force under him can do all this work. In that way, by the abolition of the marshal and his deputies, we save the Treasury about $10,000 a year.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Why not save a little more and abolish the office of marshal in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DENISON. That is not a pertinent question in connection with this legislation for the government down there. We are now dealing with the Panama Canal. I have no personal interest in this matter. It makes no difference to me personally. For personal reasons I would rather let it alone. But there is a duty resting upon us, I suppose, as representatives of the people. The Secretary of War went to work to try to cut down the expenses of the Canal Zone. He has discharged thousands of the ordinary laborers in order cut down the expenses down there, and we have complaints coming in from the laborers and their organizations to the effect that we are putting their men out of their jobs. Now, the Secretary of War wants to let out a few men higher up, the salaried men who are not needed, as well as those drawing day's wages, and the moment we undertake to do it by law, here come the friends of the man who has the job throwing out a great hullabaloo about "autocracy" and "military rule." I hope that no one in the House is going to be misled by it.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HICKEY. When ships are taken in charge by a United States marshal it is necessary to give bond, is it not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HICKEY. Does not much of that have to be done down on the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. DENISON. Well, if they have work of that kind, it has to be done, but the chief of police can do it just as well as the marshal.

Mr. HICKEY. Can it be done by the chief of police?

Mr. DENISON. Certainly, because under this act we transfer all the duties of the marshal to the chief of police.

Mr. HICKEY. Is not that an unusual thing?

Mr. DENISON. No; not at all. Congress can do all those things if it prefers to; it is simply a matter of keeping up these useless offices and spending $10,000 out of the Treasury, or transferring those duties to the chief of police and his deputies and thus saving that amount of money. We claim to our constituents that we are trying to reduce the costs of government. Our pretenses of economy will not get us anywhere, unless we put them into practical effect by abolishing useless and unnecessary jobs when we have a chance to do so.

We have here a splendid chance. If you want to continue this job of marshal in order to give a comfortable home and big salary to a friend of the gentleman from Indiana, all right. But if you want to have some regard for the Treasury and for your claims of economy you should support the provision of the pending bill. I have no personal interest whatever in the matter. I only want to do what I think is my duty.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] a moment ago asked why not, on a parity, abolish the office of marshal of the District of Columbia? Is there any comparison between the two positions? Does the marshal here in the District of Columbia perform duties only in the District, or has he a wider scope and a wider service?

Mr. DENISON. There is no similarity at all. The territorial jurisdiction of the marshal of the Canal Zone is the 10-mile strip, and so is that of the chief of police. Now, this is an effort on the part of the Government to economize in the administration of the Canal Zone, and the Secretary of War wishes to see that economy carried out.

Mr. OGDEN. What is the attitude of Judge Kerr, the district judge down there, upon this proposition?

Mr. DENISON. To be frank, I have not consulted the judge about that. I do not know how he feels about it.

Mr. OGDEN. He was here last week.

Mr. DENISON. I talked with Judge Keer in a social way, and told him I wanted to discuss these matters of legislation with him. He said he would be back and see me before he returned to the Canal Zone. At that time I did not know this bill was coming up so soon. I regret I did not get to consult him before this bill was reached for consideration by the House.

Mr. BUTLER. How much work does this marshal do? How many writs does he have to serve? And, in the gentleman's judgment, will the chief of police have time to perform the duties of both these offices?

Mr. DENISON. There is no question in the world that he will.

Mr. BUTLER. I should think he would, but I want to know.

Mr. DENISON. There is no question that he will.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. He will if he appoints deputies.

Mr. DENISON. He has the deputies there now.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this House ought to be interested in the report of the commission that went to the Panama Canal Zone, that seems to have stirred up the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on this particular measure. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] some months ago introduced in this House a measure which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I know for quite a while he was trying to get a hearing before that committee, to hear the complaints of the Panama Canal employees regarding the recommendations of this commission that were put into effect. Up to the present time, as far as I know, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have not seen fit to give Mr. COOPER and the friends of that bill a hearing.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman think that Mr. COOPER will subscribe to that statement?

Mr. NOLAN. I think so.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman be willing to ask him?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; if he is here. I know that a month ago he had not been able to get a hearing, or had not been able to get the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to set a hearing.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am taking the gentleman's statements as he makes them, and now I am ready to take this one. The gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. NOLAN. I spoke to the gentleman from Massachusetts about it myself.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman did speak to me about it, but the gentleman is not informed as to the facts.

Mr. NOLAN. But you seem to be able to give hearings on this pending measure and to report it out.

Mr. WINSLOW. We gave the hearings, but the gentleman does not seem to know about them.

Mr. NOLAN. What did this commission do when they went down there? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] says the fight is made when they want to remove some high officials. The commission went there and made some recommendations that took away from the Panama Canal employees privileges that they had from the days of Theodore Roosevelt, conditions of employment down there that were given to them as an inducement to go from the States to the Panama Canal Zone. They took away from them free rent, free light, free water, and free fuel, privileges given to every white man working for any concern in the Tropics. This commission also made a recommendation that hundreds of white American citizens be discharged from mechanical positions, skilled and semiskilled, on the Panama Canal Zone, and that those positions be turned over not to native Panamans but to alien Jamaica negroes, because they could be hired cheap.

That is another recommendation that this commission made which recommends the passage of this pending bill. They made the further recommendation, after cutting down all of these employees and dropping them from the pay roll, that the military chief of the Panama Canal Zone, Colonel Morrow, have his salary almost doubled, and that the high officials in connection with the administration of affairs down there along with Colonel Morrow have their salaries increased. Those are some of the recommendations of the commission that went to Panama, that took away from the white American citizens privileges of employment that this Government guaranteed them when it asked them to go down there to Panama.

The men are not complaining of the reduction in wages. According to law they had to take the reduction in wages. Their wages are based on the wages paid in the navy yards, and when you took away the bonus from the navy yard employees you also took it away from the Panama Canal employees. When the wages of navy yard employees were reduced, automatically that reduction went into effect among the employees of the Panama Canal. They are not complaining about that, but they are complaining about this Government of ours violating its agreement with them which it made when it took these men to the Tropics, conditions which surround every white man working for a concern in the Tropics. In doing this that commission has not been consistent. There is a whole lot more to that report that we would have liked to exploit before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee if we had had a fair opportunity and could have had hearings to air the whole thing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, personally I know nothing about the question as to who is to hold the job of marshal or who is not to hold it, and I care less, so long as a good competent American is at the helm, but it seems to me that a larger question is involved. It is a question of principle that ought to be considered by the House. The argument made in regard to abolishing the office of marshal of the Canal Zone would apply absolutely to the District of Columbia. It would apply practically to the States where there are district courts. Why not turn over the marshal's office here to the chief of police? Their jurisdiction is territorially the same. There can be no argument made in favor of abolishing the office of marshal of the Canal Zone that does not apply to abolishing the office of marshal of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman; yes.

Mr. DENISON. What office of marshal does the gentleman refer to in the District of Columbia?

Mr. RAKER. The marshal of the District of Columbia, the United States marshal.

Mr. DENISON. There is no such office there.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; there is.

Mr. DENISON. What is it?

Mr. RAKER. The marshal under the Federal law who attends the Federal court. He and his deputies execute the writs from the Federal courts.

Mr. DENISON. I thought the gentleman meant the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. No; I am talking about the marshal of the District of Columbia. The Supreme Court of the United States, of course, includes more than the District of Columbia, even the States of Illinois and California.

Now, let me call your attention to the fact that the territory of the chief of police at Panama covers the entire Canal Zone. The jurisdiction of the marshal covers the Canal Zone. The gentleman has to admit that one of the provisions of the bill is that you are reducing the jurisdiction of the court and giving jurisdiction to the police judge because the court now is overrun with business. There is no other reason. You are reducing the penalty and reducing the fine, taking the jurisdiction from the court so as to relieve it from the present congested condition that it is now in.

Let me call your attention to the fact that if this court is given this general jurisdiction over the trial of a case on appeal from the magistrate of the police court or the trial of civil cases involving over $300 up to the trying of a man for murder, with all other jurisdiction granted a nisi prius court, you are now going to say that a court with that dignity, that power, shall have as its official the policeman of the district or the territory in which the court is located. It is not an officer of his own selection, not of the selection by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, as in other district courts, but you are going to say that the court has no control over it. The bill only transfers the duties of the marshal to the chief of police and gives him the power to serve processes, and so when the court calls upon the officer to maintain order it shall be a police officer. You are taking it from the jurisdiction and power that appoints him, a man who ought to be a man of high character. It is not a question of expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. You are turning these duties over to the chief of police to protect that court. It is not a question of dollars and cents. If, as a matter of fact, the chief of police is not busy, he should discharge the duties of his office and let the marshal perform the functions of his office as created, giving it unlimited jurisdiction and everything which involves the welfare of all who live in the zone. It is not the function of a police court, it is not the control of a police court, nor should it be an officer of the police force over the jurisdiction of the Federal court.

It is not a question of dollars and cents, and it ought not to be involved, and if the statement as presented by both gentlemen of the House is correct, that the marshal has been busy through his deputies, the chief of police has been busy with his deputies, and now you are going to say that we will dispense with the office of marshal and we will give the chief of police and his deputies the right to do the business through the deputy policemen and execute the orders of the Federal court. Gentlemen, you ought not to allow such a provision as that to stand.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Under the language of this bill would the Federal court have any authority over the chief of police?

Mr. RAKER. My view is that he does not. I have read that provision of the bill, and this is what it says. It says "and the duties of marshal of said court shall be performed by the chief of police of the Canal Zone."

Now, you know and I know that the judge has plenary power, by virtue of the Constitution and statute of the court, in the appointment of the marshal. This is by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate. The judge has power over the marshal in many matters pertaining to his office and official duties. In this bill you want the Governor of the Canal Zone to appoint the chief of police, and then the chief of police look after the Federal court. It will not do, gentlemen.

Mr. DENISON. The judge does not appoint the marshal; the marshal is appointed by the President.

Mr. ROSE. And he appoints the chief of police.

Mr. RAKER. You mean the governor does that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the charge has been made that the proponent of this amendment is trying to save a citizen of Indiana who has a salary. He is not from my district, I barely know the young man. I have seen lots of things done in the name of economy, but the abolition of a United States marshal in one of the jurisdictions of the courts of the United States in the name of economy is the greatest piece of foolishness that I ever witnessed.

The Panama Canal Zone is about 50 miles long and 10 miles wide.

Mr. LAYTON. Twenty miles wide.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No; 10 miles wide.

Mr. LAYTON. It is 10 miles on each side of the canal.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Never mind, I am not yielding for that controversy. It is more than five times as big as the District of Columbia. It has a lot of important towns. It has the most important highway there is in the world going through it. The court in the Canal Zone is an important court, and as time goes on it is going to be more important. There is nobody in this House who would advocate the turning over of the duties of the United States marshal of the District Columbia to a constable or to the chief of police or to anybody else. I want to tell you now that if it is important enough to have a United States court in the Canal Zone, it is important enough to have a proper officer to enforce whatever decrees it may render.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I understand the United States marshal has to give bond, and if he seizes a ship on a libel and commits any error he is liable on his bond. Does the gentleman think that those duties in one of the most important ports in the world, where there is such a large amount of shipping, ought to be turned over to the chief of police?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not think there should be a United States court in the country that did not have all of the proper officers necessary to enforce its decrees and who acted directly under the orders of the court. I think the abolition of the United States marshal in the Canal Zone is a piece of foolishness, the same as it would be anywhere else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DENISON) there were—ayes 47, noes 44.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DENISON and Mr. BLAND of Indiana to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 9 of the Panama Canal act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That the records of the existing courts and all causes, proceedings, and criminal prosecutions pending therein as shown by the dockets thereof, except as herein otherwise provided, shall immediately upon the organization of the courts created by this act be transferred to such new courts having jurisdiction of like cases, be entered upon the dockets thereof, and proceed as if they had originally been brought therein, whereupon all the existing courts, except the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, shall cease to exist. The President may continue the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone and retain the judges thereof in office for such time as to him may seem necessary to determine finally any causes and proceedings which may be pending therein. All laws of the Canal Zone imposing duties upon the clerks or ministerial officers of existing courts shall apply and impose such duties upon the clerks and ministerial officers of the new courts created by this act having jurisdiction of like cases, matters, and duties.

"All existing laws in the Canal Zone governing practice and procedure in existing courts shall be applicable and adapted to the practice and procedure in the new courts.

"(b) The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the district court of the Canal Zone, and to render such judgments as in the opinion of the said appellate court should have been rendered by the trial court in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved, and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds $1,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party or by other competent evidence, and also in criminal cases wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony; and also in civil and criminal cases in which the jurisdiction of the trial court is in issue, but whenever any such case is not otherwise reviewable in said appellate court the question of jurisdiction alone shall be reviewable by said appellate court. And such appellate jurisdiction, subject to the right to review by or appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases authorized by law, may be exercised by said circuit court of appeals in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure as nearly as practicable as is done in reviewing the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States. Cases pending in the said circuit court of appeals at the time of the passage of this act shall not be affected hereby, but the same shall be disposed of as though this act had not been enacted.

"(c) That it shall not be necessary in the district court of the Canal Zone to exercise separately the law and equity jurisdiction vested in said court; and the code of civil procedure of the Canal Zone and the rules of practice adopted in said zone, in so far as they authorize a blending of said jurisdictions in cases at law and in equity, are hereby confirmed."

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to strike out the last word. There is one clause in this bill as to which I want to inquire whether the gentleman who prepared the bill has given careful consideration. I refer to the provision that the members of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone shall continue in office as long as the President shall deem necessary to conclude the business that is now before them. That is about the substance of it. Have we authority to give the President power to fix a term of office, or do not we have to fix a limit beyond which they can not continue?

Mr. DENISON. The provision to which the gentleman refers is existing law. That was enacted in 1912, and in amending that section we have simply repeated the section. The supreme court has long since been abolished.

Mr. STEVENSON. It has gone out of existence?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. That part of it has ended long ago?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 288 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 288. A person who engages in, instigates, aids, encourages, or does any act to further a fight commonly called a ring or prize fight, or who engages in a public or private sparring exhibition, with or without gloves, within the Canal Zone, who sends or publishes a challenge or acceptance of a challenge for such an exhibition or fight, or trains or assists any person in training or preparing for such an exhibition or fight, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not more than $5,000, or be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than three years, or both: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to voluntary boxing or sparring exhibitions conducted under rules and regulations to be promulgated by the President of the United States, or by the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone by authority of the President of the United States."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Illinois indicate what is new in this section 28?

Mr. DENISON. The proviso.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In what sense is the word "voluntary" used in the proviso—voluntary boxing or sparring exhibitions, etc.

Would the gentleman not agree to eliminating that word?

Mr. DENISON. That is used to distinguish between where a man gets into a fight involuntarily, if drawn into it, and where it is a boxing exhibition. That is the usual term used in designating boxing and fighting contests.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Involuntary fighting, or a fight that really means a fight, is not an exhibition. It is an exhibition only when it is under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Governor of the Canal Zone or the President of the United States, as is provided here. Will the gentleman not agree to accept an amendment to strike out that word?

Mr. DENISON. No; I would not. Does the gentleman know of any harm that it does?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It undoubtedly restricts the right of the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone to arrange for exhibitions, which in view of the situation down there in the Canal Zone are extremely desirable. Opportunities for recreation, diversion, or amusement are somewhat restrictive, and why possibly make the entire proviso nugatory by using an ambiguous term that can do no good and may do harm?

Mr. DENISON. What other kind of a contest could be permitted except a voluntary contest?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I would say that the provisions should not apply to boxing or sparring except where conducted under rules and regulations to be promulgated, and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "voluntary" in line 7, page 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 11, line 7, strike out the word "voluntary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am not going to criticize anybody; I am not going to mention any names; but I do believe in justice to myself and others similarly situated that I have a right to read, without referring to names, a quoted article from a California newspaper. One of the subheads of this article to which I refer is headed "House has about finished work, and so Congressman comes home." I read from the article now, without quoting the name:

Mr. ——— said yesterday that for eight months he had presided over hearings before his committee. He remained on the job until the House of Representatives practically finished its work.

"The House is about finished for the session," said ———, "and is now taking a recess of three days a week."

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it has been my supposition all along that the House is really doing business and is in session practically every day. I take it for granted that what they do is business here, and that the President knows what he is talking about when he says that one of the most important pieces of business yet before Congress is the ship subsidy bill, and I believe that there is also other legislation. Of course, it is a bit unfortunate for some of us who can not have large papers publish these matters for us, and so let it be inferred that we are simply sitting around here at Washington doing nothing and are not able to go home once in a while to attend to matters personal. However, I take it for granted that the majority side believe that we are still doing business here and have some important work to do, and that we are going to stay in session until we complete that important work.

It occurs to me that I have the right to make this observation. It has been my policy every since I have been here to stay until Congress adjourned, and when Congress is in session I have always believed that it is doing valuable work. I have never found it convenient yet to relieve myself of responsibility for being absent by the statement that the majority is not doing anything; that the business is completed; that we are adjourning three days at a time. I am sure the majority think we are working here and that they have a lot of important legislation yet to enact. If I am mistaken in that, then possibly I ought not to have quoted from this article appearing in one of the great daily papers of the West. Some of us who live about 3,000 miles from home do not go home very often. We do not go home very much unless the work is completed. We do not go home while the Congress is in session. Of course, we have not this broad publicity given to a statement that the others are simply idling here in Washington and are not home looking after matters that ought to be looked after, so that we would be in a better position to enact legislation. One has to go home now and then, you know, to see what the people want and to be able to represent their ideas. However, one can not be in two places at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 289 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 289. That every person willfully present as a spectator at any exhibition or fight mentioned in the preceding section is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How does that section 289 read at present?

Mr. DENISON. Well, the only change made in that section is that the word "contention" is stricken out. In the original it reads:

That every person willfully present as a spectator at any exhibition, contention, or fight.

The committee thought the word "contention" ought not to be in there. That would make it apply to a mere affray.

Mr. WALSH. It might apply to some of the congressional parties that go down there.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. When this language, "exhibition or fight," mentioned in the preceding section, was used there was no proviso making lawful certain exhibitions. If you leave the word "mentioned" in the preceding section in, you have a proviso making it legal to hold voluntary boxing and sparring exhibitions under rules promulgated by the President or by the governor, but make it a misdemeanor for anybody to be present, because these excepted exhibitions are mentioned in the previous section. And it seems to me the word "mentioned" ought to be stricken out and the word "prohibited" substituted.

I move to amend by striking out the word "mentioned" and insert in lieu thereof the word "prohibited."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, line 15, by striking out the word "mentioned" and insert in lieu thereof the word "prohibited."

Mr. DENISON. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman think we ought to have a fine for punishment? If a man goes to see a fight in this country now he does not get put in jail.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that the penalty for that sort of offense is defined elsewhere in the Criminal Code.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman tell us what the penalty for the misdemeanor is?

Mr. DENISON. It is a fine of not more than $300 or imprisonment in jail for not more than 30 days.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 342 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone, as amended by the Executive order of March 13, 1907, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 342. That grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases:

"1. When the property taken is of the value of $50 or more;

"2. When the property is taken from the person of another;

"3. When the property taken is a horse, mare, gelding, cow, steer, bull, calf, mule, jack, or jenny."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to know whether the last three words here in this section are the names of animals designated, or are they some peculiar kind of animals that inhabit the Canal Zone?

Mr. DENISON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will say that that is simply a repetition of the present law. It has been the law there for years and years. Those are terms used to designate the peculiar animals which are in use in the Canal Zone, on the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. WALSH. What is the difference between this section as you amend it and the section as it exists?

Mr. DENISON. The difference is this, that in the first paragraph, line 22, the value is fixed at $50 in the amended bill. The present law fixes it at $10 and makes it grand larceny to steal or take property of the value of $10 or more. The authorities think that is a harsh and unreasonable law. The committee concurred in that view, and we recommend to raise the value to $50 to constitute grand larceny. And I will say that is in harmony with the law of a great many of the States.

Mr. WALSH. Is that the only change?

Mr. DENISON. That is the only change.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know if the gentleman from Illinois can state on whose recommendation there is this encouragement to commit petty larceny carried in this bill?

Mr. DENISON. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is on the recommendation of the district attorney of the Canal Zone, of the district judge of the Canal Zone, of the Governor of the Canal Zone, and the Secretary of War. But, of course, their recommendation is not to do the thing stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. None of these war lords that have been mentioned here are involved in this recommendation?

Mr. DENISON. No war lords, unless the Secretary of War is a war lord. I do not know whether he can be so designated or not.

Mr. WALSH. Probably he was included.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment eliminating "jenny."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] a question. As to this section 342, is that merely a repetition of the law as it now stands as to the definition of grand larceny, with the exception of the penalty?

Mr. DENISON. It is, with the exception of the amount which would constitute grand larceny.

Mr. ROACH. What provision have you on larceny from a dwelling house in the Canal Zone?

Mr. DENISON. The offense of burglarly is elsewhere defined in the Criminal Code.

Mr. ROACH. I know; but to constitute burglarly there must be the breaking into of the dwelling. If a person goes into a private dwelling through an open door, there is not any burglary there, and he might steal something of less value than $50, but which would have a sacred value to the owner of the dwelling. It seems to me that the entering of a dwelling, irrespective of the worth of the article stolen, should be made grand larceny. I was wondering if the Penal Code as it now stands took care of that or not. It is not taken care of in this bill.

Mr. DENISON. The Penal Code of the Canal Zone makes no provision of that kind. This is the definition of grand larceny as it appears in the Penal Code.

Mr. ROACH. I think there is a deficiency in that respect.

In enumerating the live stock over there which it is stated constituted grand larceny to take, the word "heifer" is not included. I do not inquire facetiously, but I would like to ask if one would steal a heifer there would it be grand larceny?

Mr. DENISON. I will say we simply repeat there that part of the old law. We had to do so in order to amend it elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 6 of an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That deposit money orders issued in the Canal Zone in lieu of postal savings certificates in accordance with the rules and regulations heretofore established by the President, or that may hereafter be established by him, shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per centum per annum."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] gave some explanation of this change in the law. I would like to ask him why the people in the Canal Zone should be permitted to receive a higher rate of interest on postal savings deposits than people in this country? Why do you pick them out and give them 3 per cent interest on their deposits when in this country we pay only 2 per cent?

Mr. DENISON. Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that the Government down there desires to encourage thrift and saving on the part of the employees, and the banks in the city of Panama are offering inducements to the employees to come over to the city of Panama and deposit money in their banks.

There have been two rather unfortunate bank failures there, and our Government officials have thought that it is wiser policy for our employees to deposit their money in the post offices and let the Government pay them as much as 3 per cent rather than have them go into the city of Panama and deposit their money in the banks there, with the accompanying risks that might be involved. And then there is this further reason: These funds that are deposited in the post offices are in turn redeposited by the Canal Zone government in the banks of this country, and they get 3 and 3½ per cent interest from the banks for the money, and the administration down there thought the employees ought to have the benefit of it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, all that the gentleman has said will apply to deposits made in this country. There are banks in the various cities here that are paying 3 and 4 per cent on deposits, and which would be very glad to have them, and the money that is deposited in the postal savings banks in this country is also by the department put into other institutions at a higher rate of interest. If you are going to increase the rate of interest, why do it by piecemeal and pick out the Panama Canal Zone for the special favor?

Mr. DENISON. It is not a special favor. But we are legislating here for the Canal Zone in this legislation. If the gentleman's statement is true, it is a reason why the interest rate should be increased in the United States rather than a reason why it should not be increased on the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I am opposed to picking out the employees simply because they happen to be on the Panama Canal Zone and giving them special consideration in the matter of the money they are putting in the postal savings banks by increasing the rate of interest.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Is it not true that our people on the Panama Canal Zone do not have the same opportunity to deposit their savings that they would have at their homes here? Are not the American banks limited down there?

Mr. DENISON. There are no American banks down there, except possibly some branch banks.

Mr. BEEDY. Was not that one of the reasons why this provision was inserted in the bill?

Mr. DENISON. Of course, that is true. Congress made provision in 1916 for this arrangement for encouraging saving and thrift on the Panama Canal Zone. I think it is a very wise provision, Mr. Chairman, and I think it should be left in the way we have put it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. DIVORCE—CAUSES.—That in every case in which a marriage has been, or hereafter may be, contracted and solemnized between any two persons, and it shall be adjudged, in the manner hereinafter provided, that either party at the time of such marriage and continues to be (1) naturally impotent; or (2) that he or she had a wife or husband living at the time of such marriage; or (3) that either party has committed adultery subsequent to the marriage, except as hereinafter provided; or (4) has willfully deserted or absented herself or himself from the husband or wife without any reasonable cause for a period of one year; or (5) has been guilty of willful neglect which shall consist of the willful failure of the husband to provide for his wife the necessaries of life, he having the ability to do so, or the willful failure to do so by reason of voluntary idleness, profligacy, or dissipation, in either case continued for a period of one year; or (6) has been guilty of habitual drunkenness for the space of two years; or (7) has attempted the life of the other by any means showing malice; or (8) has been guilty of extreme and repeated cruelty, involving acts of grievous bodily injury or producing grievous mental suffering endangering life, health, or reason; or (9) has been, subsequent to the marriage, convicted of felony or other infamous crime, it shall be lawful for the injured party to obtain a divorce and dissolution of such marriage contract in the district court of the Canal Zone.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word "grievous," in line 2 of page 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word "grievous," in line 2 of page 15. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. What is the present law on the Canal Zone with reference to cause for divorce by reason of desertion?

Mr. DENISON. There is no divorce law on the Canal Zone now. A divorce can not be had for any cause there now.

Mr. WALSH. You can get a marriage annulled?

Mr. DENISON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman, if he will consult the law, will find that they can. We had this law before the Judiciary Committee before the Governor of the Canal Zone appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I think if the gentleman will examine the code he will find that there is law for annulling a marriage.

Mr. DENISON. Perhaps the gentleman was not in when I explained that on the day before yesterday. There is no law at this time respecting divorce on the Panama Canal Zone, but a former judge did assume jurisdiction and did annul some marriages and granted some divorces. There is a provision in the pending bill to validate those divorces. The former court assumed jurisdiction. The present judge has investigated the matter very carefully and has rendered an able opinion on that whole subject. He holds that the court is absolutely without any jurisdiction, and he has dismissed all cases of that kind that came before him.

Mr. WALSH. And the other judge, with an equally able opinion, assumed jurisdiction and proceeded to act. Now, how did you arrive at the period of desertion as one year? Is that the usual period in the United States?

Mr. DENISON. That is the average period provided for in the laws of the different States as a ground of divorce for willful desertion.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is two years in Indiana.

Mr. WALSH. That period of one year is a minimum, and there are very few States that have it except States that boast of a Reno and various other havens for people who like to consider contracts of marriage as a pastime. I would like to know if the gentleman thinks, inasmuch as we are going to furnish the Canal Zone with a law relating to divorces, whether or not we ought perhaps to make the period for which the desertion shall continue a little longer than a year?

Mr. DENISON. The law in a number of States provides that where a husband willfully deserts his wife and leaves her entirely without support for one year, the wife should be entitled to a divorce. I do not think a woman who has been willfully deserted by her husband without cause, and who is thereby thrown upon her own resources, should be compelled to wait and suffer for a period of two years.

Mr. WALSH. Why not make it three months then, along that line?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman's question answers itself.

Mr. WALSH. No; it does not. The gentleman is making the argument that the poor woman ought not to be compelled to suffer. If that is the purpose, to eliminate suffering, and this is a palliative, three months might be preferable; but if a brute of a husband is addicted to drunkenness the poor wife must suffer for two years before she can get a divorce, and the husband may not be contributing a cent to her support, but is living with her, and he must be habitually drunk or guilty of habitual drunkenness for two years.

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But if he goes over into Jamaica to reside among the dark-hued gentlemen, he has to stay there only a year before she can get a divorce.

Mr. DENISON. I think there is a difference between the two, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts will see it at a glance. A person who is guilty of habitual drunkenness yields to a natural weakness or appetite, which is not, perhaps, a moral fault on his part. It may be due to a natural appetite.

Mr. WALSH. How is anybody going to be guilty of habitual drunkenness for two years down there under the existing constitutional amendment and the Volstead law?

Mr. DENISON. To continue my statement, when a man willfully deserts his wife, that is not the yielding to a natural appetite or weakness. That is a direct and willful injury to her. He repudiates all his marital duties and obligations.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that the gentleman is an expert in such matters, but I would like to know——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will permit me, I think there is a moral difference between a man yielding to his appetite for drink and a man willfully deserting his wife and leaving her without support.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if this applies to the people who have gone from the United States to the Canal Zone?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Or from Panama.

Mr. WALSH. And the one year for which the desertion must continue will not begin to run until this act becomes a law. Is that correct?

Mr. DENISON. Oh, no; I would not say that that was so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in line 17, at the end of the line, to strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two," and in line 18, strike out the word "year" and insert the word "years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 14, line 17, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two," and in line 18 strike out the word "year" and insert in lieu thereof the word "years."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, we do not enact very many statutes covering the proceedings in divorce. Now for the first time we are providing a divorce law for the Panama Canal Zone. Notwithstanding the very pathetic presentation made by the distinguished gentleman in charge of this measure, it would seem to me that rather than take the minimum which prevails in the States of the Union we might take the average length of time which is required. Some States require three years, some one, and one, I think, six months; although it is my impression that the one State which heretofore required six months has lengthened that time to a year, and I think it would be more in keeping with the proprieties of the occasion, if they might be so termed, if Congress did not start out by holding out the hope that when it does take over the marriage and divorce laws of the country, as a great many people wish it to do, we will make it particularly easy to secure divorces. I do not agree with the contention made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. If his argument is sound the length of time might be made three months; but here is a colony down there, a zone under our jurisdiction, with a great many people going down there from the States and procuring positions, and quite a few of them losing their positions. All that would be necessary would be for a year to elapse before they would be permitted to secure divorces.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is there any distinction in the gentleman's mind between the terms "willfully deserted" and "absented herself or himself"?

Mr. WALSH. There certainly is.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In States which have made desertion a cause for divorce it has been held that the desertion must be against the will of the deserted party.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But merely to "absent herself or himself" might be with or without the consent of the deserted party, or a matter of indifference, and this bill does not say "has willfully deserted and absented himself for one year," or two years, as the case may be, but it says "has willfully deserted or" simply "absented himself."

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I would suggest that either the words "or absented herself or himself" be stricken out as superfluous, or else that the "or" be changed to "and," because "absented himself" is merely a description of the continuation of the desertion in that event.

Mr. DENISON. The word "willfully" would apply both to "deserted" and "absented."

Mr. LEHLBACH. But the question is whether the absenting himself is without the consent of the other party.

Mr. WALSH. I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey should be adopted, but I should like to see the time of the desertion extended for a year. There will be other trips taken by gentlemen who go down to Panama and become very familiar with the wishes of the authorities there and who will present legislation in accordance with their desires. If we make this too long, gentlemen when they arrive will have it duly explained and the gentleman can introduce a bill and have it considered.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, that provision in the bill was suggested in a bill drafted by the special attorney for the Canal Zone government. I found upon looking at the divorce laws of several States—I am more familiar with the Illinois law—that they have similar provisions providing for a divorce where the husband or the wife has willfully deserted the other for a period of one year.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it one year or two years in Illinois?

Mr. DENISON. Two years willful desertion, I think; but my memory may not be correct.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I did not think that Illinois had a one-year provision in the statute of desertion or one year for a failure to support. But that may be true. In any of the States where it is less than two years it is regarded as too liberal for very good reasons. I heard a colleague of mine say that if a man willfully deserted his wife for one year they ought to be divorced. The trouble is that they agree to separate and go to a place where they can stay for one year so that one can say truthfully that the other walked off and deserted. The failure to provide comes under the same kind of evidence, because if he deserts her he fails to provide. If they could not separate so quickly, if they had to wait two years before they could get unhitched, then they would have to suffer, as the gentleman from Illinois says, for two years.

Mr. LAYTON. It makes no difference what time you provide for; if it was 10 years it would be the same if they wanted to get a divorce.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Oh, no; they have time to cool off. We have a cooling-off period in Indiana. They can not get a divorce for 60 days after they file the application, and many go back and live together. If you make the time two years, they will have time to think it over. It is the policy of the court to promote marriage instead of divorce, but this promotes divorce instead of marriage.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not the observation of the gentleman that the more lax you make the divorce laws the greater the willingness of young men and young women to take a chance at it, knowing that if it does not work out all right they can be separated?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; that is right.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not make it 20 years?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In some States they have no cause for divorce at all except adultery.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I think in Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Michigan, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Wyoming, in all those States, the limit is one year.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is two years in Michigan. I think there would be less divorces and more people would continue to live together if you make it two years.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, departing for a minute from the consideration of time, will the chairman explain the significance of the word "naturally" in the phrase "naturally impotent"?

Mr. LAYTON. That simply means where the person is congenitally impotent—where he is impotent from birth.

Mr. BEEDY. Then impotence by reason of his own debauchery would not be a ground for divorce?

Mr. LAYTON. No; not under this provision.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If he was in that condition prior to marriage——

Mr. LAYTON. That is not what this refers to; this refers to a man that is congenitally impotent—that is, impotent from birth.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. We have a statute of that kind in Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DENISON) there were—ayes 27, noes 18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "or," in line 16, on page 14, and inserting the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 16, strike out the word "or" where it occurs the first time and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the word "desertion" has a judicial well-defined meaning, and is ground for divorce. It means not only absence against the will of the deserted party but includes failure to support on the part of the husband. As it is, desertion would be a ground for divorce, and mere absence, which might be acquiesced in, would be a ground of divorce which is not intended, but if you change the conjunction "or" to "and" the willful desertion must be continued for two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not see any use for that first word. Suppose a woman marries a man who is impotent; then, regardless of how it happens, her relief should be the same, whether it happened naturally or by virtue of his own conduct, if it was before he married her. I think it ought to say "continued to be impotent" and not "naturally impotent." If he is impotent at the time of marriage, no matter whether from natural causes or otherwise, she should have the right to that relief.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. Process—service—notice by publication: (a) The clerk of the district court shall issue a summons for the defendant to appear and answer, which summons shall be personally served on the defendant, if the defendant is found on the Canal Zone, by delivering a true copy thereof to the defendant in person.

(b) When any petitioner shall file in the office of the clerk of the district court an affidavit showing—

(1) That the husband and wife have their legal domicile in the Canal Zone and that the defendant has gone out of the Canal Zone and willfully refuses to return, so that process can not be personally served upon him or her; or

(2) That the marriage was celebrated in the Canal Zone and the wife, being the petitioner, continues to reside therein, and the husband, being the defendant, has abandoned his wife and gone out of the Canal Zone to avoid his marital obligations; or

(3) That the marriage was celebrated in the Canal Zone and the husband, being petitioner, continues to reside therein and was abandoned by his wife, the defendant, who has gone out of the Canal Zone in disregard of her marriage obligation; and

When such affidavit states the present place of residence of the defendant, if known, or that upon diligent inquiry his or her present place of residence can not be ascertained, and stating the last known place of residence of the defendant, the clerk shall cause publication to be made in some newspaper published in the Canal Zone, and if there is no newspaper published in the Canal Zone, then in the nearest reliable newspaper with a general circulation published in the Republic of Panama, and printed in English or having an English section or edition, containing notice of the pendency of such suit, the names of the parties thereto, the time and place of return of the summons in the case; and he shall also, within 10 days after the first publication of such notice, send a copy thereof by mail addressed to the defendant at the last known place of residence stated in the affidavit. The certificate of the clerk that he has sent such notice shall be evidence thereof.

(c) The notice by publication required herein may be given at any time after the commencement of the suit and after summons has been returned showing that the defendant was not found on the Canal Zone, and shall be published at least once each week for three successive weeks, and no default or proceeding shall be taken against any defendant not personally served with summons and not appearing, unless 90 days shall intervene between the first publication as aforesaid and the date at which such default or proceeding is proposed to be taken. All the facts necessary to constitute personal service, where personal service is had, or to authorize the notice by publication, where service is had by publication, must be established to the satisfaction of the court by competent evidence: Provided, That if the defendant resides or is found within the Republic of Panama and the place of such residence is established to the satisfaction of the court by competent evidence, then such default or other proceeding may be taken against the defendant when 30 days shall intervene between the first publication and the date at which such default or proceeding is proposed to be taken.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the whole section on divorce.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LOWREY: Page 16, beginning on line 13, strike out all of section 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. Issue and trial: (a) The cause shall stand for trial after the summons has been personally served upon the defendant at least 10 days, or 90 days after the first publication, or 30 days after the first publication if the defendant resides in the Republic of Panama. The process and practice under proceedings for divorce shall be the same as in other cases in chancery except as in this act otherwise provided, and except that the answer of the defendant need not be under oath.

(b) If the bill is taken as confessed, the court shall proceed to hear the cause by examination of witnesses in open court, and in no case of default shall the court grant a divorce unless the judge is satisfied that all proper means have been taken to notify the defendant of the pendency of the suit, and that the cause of divorce has been fully proven by competent evidence. Whenever the district judge is satisfied that the interests of the defendant require it, the court may order such additional notice as equity may seem to require.

(c) No admission of the defendant shall be taken as evidence unless the court shall be satisfied that such admission was made in sincerity and without fraud or collusion to enable the complainant to obtain a divorce. If it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the injury complained of was occasioned by collusion of the parties, or done with the assent of the complainant for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, or that the complainant was consenting thereto, then no divorce shall be decreed.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill about the concluding language in subsection (a) of section 16, in lines 8 and 9—and except that the answer of the defendant need not be under oath.

What is the reason for that?

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman is familiar with the chancery rule that if the answer of the defendant is under oath it shifts the burden of proof. Generally, it is expressly waived in the bill of the complainant in order to avoid the answer being made under oath.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Suppose the husband answers, denying his wife's allegation, and states affirmatively the fact that the wife has been guilty of lewd conduct? Does the gentleman then say that the defendant ought to have the right to make such an answer without its being under oath if the wife elects?

Mr. DENISON. Oh, I do not think so. He would have to go into court and prove it anyway.

Mr. KINCHELOE. He would have to do that in any proceeding. If the wife sued the husband upon the ground of desertion for two years, and the husband should file an answer and deny the allegation in the petition and then assert affirmatively that his wife was guilty of lewd conduct, then I think the wife ought to have the right to demand that the husband swear to that proposition before it should be considered in any court.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman states an extreme case.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, I think it is not an extreme case.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is provided in the paragraph that the proceedings shall be the same as in other causes in chancery. Why not leave the matter of the answer to the divorce proceeding the same as in other cases in chancery? Why make an exception in so far as divorce cases are concerned? It seems to me that is indefensible. Why not leave the equity proceeding in a divorce case just as the equity proceeding is left in other cases, in so far as the answer is concerned?

Mr. DENISON. This provision in section 16 is taken literally from divorce laws of several of the States, and if the gentleman can state any particular reason why it should not be there, I have no objection to its going out. We are simply following the precedents used in other States.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would state to my friend that he would be perfectly safe in omitting it and leaving the equity proceedings in a divorce case exactly as they are in other cases.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KINCHELOE: Page 19, line 8, strike out the comma after the word "provided" and the words "and except that the answer of the defendant need not be under oath."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The report shows that the procedure here is adapted from the State of California. In all cases there where the complaint is sworn to the defendant must verify his answer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman says that this shows on its face that it is a departure from the general proceedings in chancery. In line 6 it is provided that the process and practice under the proceedings for divorce shall be the same as in other cases in chancery, except as in this act otherwise provided, and then there is the further exception that the answer of the defendant need not be under oath. When a woman goes into court and sets up in good faith legitimate grounds for divorce on the ground of desertion or nonsupport or drunkenness, I do not believe the man ought to have the right to come in and set up in his answer an aspersion upon her good name unless he swears to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. Legitimacy of children: No divorce shall in anywise affect the legitimacy of the children of such marriage, except in cases where the marriage shall be declared void on the grounds of a prior marriage.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 11, page 20, by striking out the words "except in cases where the marriage shall be declared void on the grounds of a prior marriage."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CURRY: Page 20, line 11, after the word "marriage" strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, a child who is the result of such a marriage is certainly entitled to protection in the use of the family name and in the right to inherit property. The child is born in wedlock, afterwards declared to be illegal on the ground of misinformation given by one party to the other. I do not think the child should be penalized in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. Cross petition and proceedings thereon: In addition to an answer, the defendant may file a cross petition for divorce; and when filed the court shall decree the divorce to the party legally entitled thereto. If the original petition be dismissed after the filing of the cross petition, the defendant may proceed to the trial of the cross petition without further notice to the adverse party; and the case upon such cross petition shall in all things be governed by the same rules applicable to a case on an original petition.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] why should section 19 be in the bill at all? Under the provisions of subsection (a) of section 16 you say the practice shall be the same as in other cases of chancery. In other proceedings he has the right to do it, anyhow. I am asking for information.

Mr. DENISON. This is making arrangements for special proceedings for divorce. This authorizes the defendant to come in and file a cross petition and obtain the same relief the plaintiff is asking for in the original petition.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Would he not have that same right as set out in subsection (a), section 16?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. Alimony pending suit: (a) In all cases of divorce the court may require the husband to pay to the wife or pay into court for her use during the pendency of the suit such sum or sums of money as may enable her to maintain or defend the suit; and in every suit for divorce, the wife, when it is just and equitable, shall be entitled to alimony during the pendency of the suit. And in case of appeal or writ of error by the husband, the district court may grant and enforce the payment of such money for her defense and such equitable alimony during the pendency of the appeal or writ of error as to the court shall seem reasonable and proper.

(b) The court, upon granting to a woman a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, may allow her to resume her maiden name or the name of any former husband.

(c) Whenever a divorce is granted, if it shall appear to the court that either party holds the title to property equitably belonging to the other, the court may compel conveyance thereof to the party entitled to the same, upon such terms as it shall deem equitable.

(d) When a divorce shall be decreed the court may make such order touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, the care, custody, and support of the children, or any of them as, from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case, shall be reasonable and just; and in case the wife be complainant, to order the defendant to give reasonable security for such alimony and maintenance, or may enforce the payment of such alimony and maintenance in any other manner consistent with the rules and practice of the court. And the court may, on application, from time to time make such alterations in the allowance of alimony and maintenance and the care, custody, and support of the children as shall appear reasonable and proper. In decreeing a divorce to the wife the court may order the husband to pay alimony in a gross sum or in installments, as may seem best. And it may make such orders and enforce the same by attachment and secure the payment of such alimony, but judgment for alimony can not be taken when the defendant is not personally served with summons or does not voluntarily appear.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. In subsection (b), just read, of section 23, you allow her to resume her maiden name or the name of her former husband. Should that permission be granted where children are born of a marriage?

Mr. DENISON. Well, the courts hardly ever do that when there are children, but I think if the party wants to do it and the court sees no objection to its being done, it would be all right.

Mr. ROACH. It seems to me that should be limited to cases where there are no children born of the marriage.

Mr. DENISON. Sometimes the children are in custody of the other party and there might be no objection to it.

Mr. ROACH. It would be discretionary with the judge. It becomes mandatory in the manner in which it is written here.

Mr. DENISON. It says "may allow." It is left to the discretion of the court, and generally where there are children from the marriage the court should not allow the wife to resume her maiden name. This simply allows the court to do that where there is no reason why it should not be done.

Mr. ROACH. The maiden name is restored where there are no children living?

Mr. DENISON. This gives the court the right to change the woman's name back to her maiden name under such circumstances as the court thinks it ought to be done.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. Remarriage within one year forbidden: In every case in which a divorce has been granted neither party shall marry again within one year from the time the decree was granted: Provided, That when the cause for such divorce is adultery the person decreed guilty of adultery shall not marry for a term of two years from the time the decree was granted: Provided, however, That nothing in this paragraph shall prevent the persons divorced from remarrying each other, and every person marrying contrary to the provisions of this paragraph shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than three years, and said marriage shall be held absolutely void.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the chairman to this: In line 15, page 22, you make the time of limitation commence to run from the "granting" of the decree. In most of the States, in practically all of them, the time it commences to run is when the decree is "entered." For this reason: The court renders the decree, and there is no knowledge of it or record of it; nobody pays any attention to it; and you protect the parties. You have got something to act upon, and the limitation does not commence to run until the time is finally entered on the decree or judgment book by the clerk. What is the reason for making a change here?

Mr. DENISON. I am not aware of any distinction between the two.

Mr. RAKER. It is the law that the marriage is absolutely void if a marriage is made at any time within a year after the decree is entered, but it may have been rendered three years before.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It does not say "entered." It says "granted."

Mr. RAKER. "Granted" does not amount to anything. Now, the court renders the decree in open court. The mere fact of the recordation and signing is another thing. But in all these divorce cases—let me make it plain—the limitation of a year does not begin to run until the decree is actually entered. As an illustration of many of them in the Western States and the Eastern States, a woman got a divorce some seven years ago, and the attorney told her the decree was entered. She waited two years and the decree was not entered. She married within a year after the decree was entered. She married a soldier. The soldier died. She applied for a pension. The department held and the court held that the marriage was illegal, and she was guilty of the offense because she married within one year after the decree was entered, but over three years had elapsed after the decree was "granted."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In most of the courts there is no way of telling when the decree was actually transcribed in the record. It is stated the court did a certain thing on that day, but very often they are not actually transcribed on the record until some other date. There is no way of telling when they are put on the record.

Mr. RAKER. That is the only way to tell. This is a judgment and decree, and the clerk's record certifies and states when the decree is entered. It may be granted, but it may be a month or two months before the clerk enters it.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Now, there ought to be a definite time when the year commences, and I want to suggest to the gentleman that he amend it by making it a year after the decree is entered.

Mr. DENISON. Whenever the court grants a decree it amounts to nothing unless he enters it on the record. Whenever the decree is written on and entered upon the record it is entered of the date when the court granted it.

Mr. RAKER. This law says within a year after the decree is granted. Now, when the judge announces from the bench a decree it is granted, but it may not be entered for a month or two months or for a year afterwards.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr, DOWELL. Suppose the decree is never entered of record. Do you say, then, the divorce is granted?

Mr. RAKER. It is granted, but no final judgment has been entered. This should and must be done, and not until this is done shall the time commence to run.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I am telling you that the courts of your State and of practically all the Western States say that a party can not be married within a year after the decree is entered. Now, it may run a month or two months.

Mr. DOWELL. Of course, it is a question of statute.

Mr. RAKER. A decree may be signed by the judge. If the party marries within a year and the decree has not been entered by the clerk, as it ought to be, and recorded, and the party marries, the marriage is void and the party is guilty of an offense.

Mr. DOWELL. That is because of a special statute in your State.

Mr. RAKER. No; not a special statute.

Mr. DOWELL. But in this case the divorce is granted when the decree is placed on the record.

Mr. RAKER. That does not say that at all.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman will notice the first three lines he will see they require the court to order that the parties do not marry again for one year. In Indiana that has been held unconstitutional as abridging the right of contract. Here is a divorce law that gives the right to a woman to go and get a divorce because she married a man who was impotent. Suppose you give her a divorce for that reason. Now you penalize her and say she shall not marry for a year. I do not think it is right. I do not think you have a right to do that under the Constitution. Our judges do not pay much attention to this kind of law in Indiana. Nobody has ever had the nerve to take it up to the Supreme Court of Indiana. Our local courts have held that it is clearly an abridgment of the right of contract, and I call your attention to the fact that in this specific instance it would be very unwise.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a divorce which is granted by statute shall not be limited by a statute determining the rights of the party?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not think you have the right to restrain a marriage contract after a decree has been granted.

Mr. WALSH. Do the Indiana laws hold that if a man has one wife and marries another she is not allowed to marry again on account of the abridgment of a contract?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is the policy of marriage and the policy of the court and the policy of the country that you can not have more than one wife, but it is against public policy to discourage the marrying contract.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I suppose it has been decided in that way by some decision rendered at somebody's corners in the State of Indiana.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. On line 17, page 22, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. WALSH. In some of the States a decree is granted as a decree nisi, and it does not become absolute until the expiration of a year after the entry of the decree nisi, and of course the divorce does not become effective until the entry of the absolute decree, which is a year from the time the decree was entered nisi.

Mr. WINGO. That is not the case in this instance. In the bill that we have under consideration now a man who has been divorced on account of adultery is kept from marrying again for two years. I think he should have at least 10 years. I am wondering what the law is in the State of Indiana. We have heard a great deal about it this afternoon. I wonder if the provision in this bill is a copy of the Indiana statute. I propose to make it 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That all proceedings in the district court of the Canal Zone, wherein and whereby a decree of divorce has heretofore been granted upon legal service, and wherein other orders have been made affecting the status of the parties or their children, are hereby legalized.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that where he undertakes to validate what has been done by the decree of the court in certain cases, where the action was taken on legal service, if the court acted without authority there was no legal service at all. What the gentleman ought to do, it seems to me, would be to provide that where the decree of divorce was granted without authority the bill should refer to the service that was actually had.

Mr. DENISON. That is what is meant by the word "legal"—either personal service or service by publication.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But there was no legal service.

Mr. DENISON. What else except personal service or service by publication would be legal service?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But there was nothing that could be considered legal service at the time the court acted, because there was no legal foundation for the action of the court, and it is important that you should define what you mean, that the judge or judges who granted divorces without jurisdiction to do so granted them upon personal service or upon service by publication. It will clarify your meaning to state that.

Mr. DENISON. We are trying to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is what is intended, and I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, that in line 3 the word "legal" be stricken out and the word "personal" substituted, and following the word "service," to insert the words "or service by publication," so that the paragraph as amended will read—wherein and whereby a decree of divorce has heretofore been granted upon personal service or service by publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 23, line 3, strike out the word "legal" and insert in lieu thereof the word "personal," and after the word "service," insert the words "or service by publication."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the gentleman's amendment goes a good deal further than the bill provides for, because there might be service by publication, but a service which was defective and not in legal form.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But we want to validate divorces granted in cases where the defendant was served personally or where there was publication, even though that publication may not have been of the character prescribed in this bill for future proceedings.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman's amendment cover proceedings where there was neither personal service nor service by publication, but where the parties voluntarily entered their appearance in court?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I take it for granted that would be assumed to be considered personal service as a matter of course.

Mr. DENISON. We are trying by the provisions of the bill to validate those cases where divorces have been granted, where the parties were before the court.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think that is quite proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That all laws, orders, and regulations, or parts thereof in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, there is an error in the title to the bill. I do not know whether that ought to be corrected now or later.

Mr. CHALMERS. That should be corrected in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be corrected in the House.

Mr. DENISON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11872) to amend sections 7, 8, and 9, of the Panama Canal act; to amend sections 288, 289, 342, 343, 368, and 461 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone; and section 2 of the Executive order of July 9, 1914, establishing rules and regulations for the opening and navigation of the Panama Canal and approaches thereto, including all water under its jurisdiction; to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and to regulate divorces in the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the so-called Bland amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the Bland amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Indiana: After the word "affairs," page 3, line 16, insert the following: "There shall be a marshal for said district. It shall be the duty of the marshal to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things incident to the office of marshal. The marshal shall be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum."

Strike out all after the word "affairs," in line 16, page 7, to and including line 2, page 8. Strike out the word "and," after the word "judge," in line 3, page 8, insert a comma, and add the words "and the marshal" after the word "attorney" in said line.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DENISON) there were—ayes 28, noes 21.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees. Those in favor of the amendment will as their names are called answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 93, not voting 205, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LOWREY moves to recommit H. R. 11872 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out sections numbered 12 to 22, inclusive.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the title by substituting the word "operation" for the word "opening" in line 5 of the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. DENISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. FAIRFIELD, for three weeks, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order to-morrow to take up the Private Calendar to consider bills unobjected to, the call to commence where the last call left off.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that to-morrow it shall be in order to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, beginning the call where the call last left off. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the District of Columbia, disagree to the Senate amendment to the House amendment to amendment No. 1 of the Senate, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendment to the bill, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has not this bill been to conference?

Mr. MADDEN. It has been to conference, and the conferees made a report. The House adopted that report, and the Senate amended the report adopted by the House, and it now comes back with an amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1, which has not yet been in conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was the other report a complete report?

Mr. MADDEN. As I understand it; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the House take any action on those amendments to which the House disagreed?

Mr. MADDEN. It did. The Senate amended the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate, which the House had agreed to as a result of the conference, and when the action of the House went back, after the adoption of the conference report, the Senate amended that, and it now comes back to the House amended.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is only one amendment in disagreement, and that is Senate amendment No. 1?

Mr. MADDEN. As I understand it; yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is that amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. That has to do with the fiscal affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that the amendment creating a commission?

Mr. MADDEN. There are several phases to it. It creates a commission, fixes different kinds of payment of taxes, and other things.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the course which the gentleman is asking to have taken agreeable to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. MADDEN. It is done after consultation with him. We are unanimous about it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. As I recall the procedure, the House adopted amendment No. 1 as a separate proposition, as an amendment to the conference report.

Mr. MADDEN. That is right.

Mr. MAPES. That went back to the Senate, and the Senate amended it by putting on the so-called Jones resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. And that is the matter which the gentleman wants to have sent to conference?

Mr. MADDEN. They modified it in other ways also.

Mr. STAFFORD. My impression was that when the bill last left the House there were other Senate amendments in disagreement besides Senate amendment No. 1, and that no conference has been had between the two bodies since then, and the Senate has taken action only on Senate amendment No. 1 and left the other Senate amendments in disagreement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is the so-called Jones resolution or bill the only matter in disagreement?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; there are two or three items in disagreement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Modifying the fiscal plan, generally?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. There are two or three items in one amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I examined the papers that were returned to the House this morning and found that there were several amendments still in disagreement. I know the chairman of the committee has been very busy since these papers came over considering estimates on the deficiency bill. According to the report of May 3 the House receded from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 with an amendment. It also receded from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 78 with an amendment, also Senate amendment No. 79 and other Senate amendments, and the House insisted upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 186. Senate amendment No. 186 relates to the purchase of property in Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway, and I should think the gentleman would like to have a conference on all the matters in disagreement.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood there was but one matter in disagreement. As the gentleman says, I have been very busy. I desire to disagree to all of the Senate amendments, of course, and have them go to conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Apparently the Senate has not acted on some of the House amendments. It has acted on Senate amendment No. 1 and returned it. The message accompanying the papers refers to only one amendment. There are several other amendments which the House has concurred in with an amendment upon which the Senate has not yet acted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, may I read what Senator PHIPPS, chairman of the subcommittee, said in connection with this:

Mr. PHIPPS. The District of Columbia appropriation bill, House bill 10101, has received the approval of both Houses, with the exception of the first amendment of the Senate, the fiscal feature of the bill, which was amended by the House, and the House amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I was authorized by that committee to report it back with a slight amendment, which will be found on page 3 of the amendment adopted by the House, and which is to insert, after the word "discretion," in line 10 of the House text, "to any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate."

It is simply a matter of precaution to have the language put in such form that it can not be misunderstood or misconstrued. I ask that the amendment may be approved.

So from the RECORD it would appear that there was only one amendment to be considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the papers in the custody of the House it shows that the Senate has not acted upon the other amendments in disagreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1; insist on the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 78, 79, 86, 101, 115, 116, 142, 155, 163, and 187; further insist on the disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 186; and ask a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the House has already insisted on these other matters. I will not object if the gentleman thinks this is the best.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House concurred with an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They insisted on a disagreement to No. 186, according to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] just now.

Mr. MADDEN. If they have not receded, we want to be authorized to take up all of them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman wants to do this, all right; but it seems to me the proper course would be to return the bill to the Senate and let them act on the part they have not acted on. However, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Is there objection to the Chair appointing the conferees? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore named the following conferees: Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CRAMTON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa presents a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution No. 344, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order as to whether it is privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order as to whether it is privileged, and reserves all points of order on the resolution.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT HARDING AT FORT M'HENRY.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HILL. Yesterday at Fort McHenry, in Baltimore, the President dedicated a memorial to Francis Scott Key, the author of "The Star Spangled Banner." Recently there appeared in some of the newspapers a paid advertisement attacking the national anthem, which symbolizes the ideals for which our men have fought and died. I ask unanimous consent, as an answer to such propaganda, to extend my remarks by inserting the address of the President in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type the address delivered by the President yesterday at Fort McHenry.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he proposes to insert anything regarding the criticism of "The Star Spangled Banner," or only the President's address?

Mr. HILL. I will say to the gentleman that no man in this Chamber could read the attack which was publicly printed against "The Star Spangled Banner" without having his blood boil, but I feel such an attack should not be dignified by any further reference to it. I think that the magnificent address of the President itself stands for the spirit back of the "Star Spangled Banner" and alone is sufficient answer to the slanders I referred to.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Then, it is the address only?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Maryland know whether this is also to be printed in the Senate proceedings?

Mr. HILL. My information is that it is not to be so extended, but I do not know definitely.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman should learn that it is to be extended, he would not duplicate?

Mr. HILL. I would not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE DEDICATION OF THE FRANCIS SCOTT KEY MEMORIAL AT FORT MCHENRY, BALTIMORE, JUNE 14, 1922.

My fellow Americans, the shrines of American patriotism not only reflect the quality of its gratitude, but they are ever refreshing and inspiring. We are assembled to-day to rededicate one of these sacred shrines. We are met to commemorate a historic victory in arms, when the young Republic was first asserting its national rights against an armed foe. And we are met to commemorate a very unique achievement in the literature of national inspiration. Here the patriotic sons of the early Republic crushed one of the most ambitious invasions ever aimed against our Nation. Here, during the rage of combat, was born the swelling anthem of American patriotism.

It is wholly fitting that Flag Day should be chosen for this commemoration and rededication, because our hymn of patriotism is an apostrophe to the flag we love. Yea, it is apostrophe and invocation as well, born of a patriotic and poetic soul in the travail of a sublimely heroic night.

Some one has said, in substance: "Let me write the songs of a people and I care not who makes their laws." That quotation presents one of the living truths, in every land, under every sky, about the appeal of poetry and song to the finer sentiments of the human heart. The truth is completely demonstrated in the appeal which "The Star-Spangled Banner" made to the American people from the day it came from the poet's heart and pen.

I think it fair to say that we have come here to-day not so much to pay tribute to the genius which caught the inspiration of a vital moment and wrote that inspiration into one of the songs of the ages, but rather more to memorialize the patriotic service of the author in his everlasting contribution to the soul uplift and exaltation of his countrymen who live after him.

Francis Scott Key, though he produced some splendid lines, which are less familiar than they deserve, was not a great poet. He was less, but he was also more, than a great poet. He was possessor of a patriotism which in a supreme moment could make words and meters its creatures and servitors; and so a modest genius was raised in one flaming hour to place among the immortals. That the song became instantly popular, and that when set to music it was immediately adopted as the anthem of militant Americanism, testifies that already, more than a century ago, the conviction of a great nationalism and a great destiny had taken hold upon the American people. To give ringing voice to such a conviction, to such an aspiration, was one of the greatest services which any man could do for the young Republic. That was the service of Francis Scott Key. It was not in the production of soul-stirring lines, thrilling with martial appeal; it was in the contribution of his great hymn toward creating that sense of national pride and that realization of responsibility for a great adventure in behalf of humanity, which became at last the inspiration of union preserved and of nationalism established.

To one who has a bent for such oddities there will be found much of absorbing interest in the study of those songs of patriotism which at different eras have enjoyed popularity. The Civil War brought a generous contribution of songs, good, bad, and indifferent, but all aiding to fire the national spirit. Once they were on millions of tongues, sung in every assembly; yet one will have difficulty finding anybody of the present generation who is familiar with more than a line or two from any of them. I must, of course, except "Dixie," which in the years since Appomattox has been claimed, like every other good thing that the South possessed, as part of the common heritage of the entire people.

Again, the Spanish-American War set us all singing "There's a Hot Time in the Old Town To-night," which in a day became the Army's marching and fighting song. The World War produced a really remarkable group of the songs of inspiration and patriotism. It seems only yesterday that we were singing them. There were many, and they served well; but none has ever for a moment threatened the throne which "The Star Spangled Banner" occupies as the royal anthem of American patriotism.

The composition of "The Star Spangled Banner" seemed at the time a minor incident among major events. The British Government had sent a great expedition to occupy the Chesapeake, and to drive out the privateers which from its waters made their tireless forays against British shipping, and to create the base from which to drive a great military force northward. Simultaneously an army was to advance from Canada southward through the Hudson Valley, the general plan being to split the country along the line of the Hudson, the Delaware, and the Chesapeake. It was the same strategical conception fundamental in the British program of Revolutionary years.

The campaign started off successfully. The British occupied the lower Chesapeake and Potomac, captured Washington, and then turned to reduce Fort McHenry, sentinel at the gates of Baltimore. Then the way would be open for the army's operation in accordance with the general design.

One need not tell a Maryland audience how significant was the failure of the night attack on Fort McHenry. It spelled the failure of the most ambitious project ever put forth for the subjugation of this continent. The Maryland Militia and the limited force of Regulars saved the Chesapeake, and won for Baltimore the distinction of being the only great seaport on the Atlantic coast which has never been occupied by an enemy. I trust that for all the future Baltimore will have to share that fortune with every other seaport; but the fact remains that when the British armada of 1814 retired, beaten, from Fort McHenry, it left with Baltimore the eminence of being the one great American port over which no enemy flag had ever waved.

Great as were the issues decided that September day, the victory has proved of very minor interest in the popular mind, compared to the fact that the battle inspired "The Star Spangled Banner." Mr. Key had gone as a quasi-official envoy on board the British flagship to seek release of an American prisoner. Admiral Cockburn was unwilling to let him return until after the bombardment, lest some of the plans should get to the knowledge of the Americans. So Mr. Key and a friend were retained on board a cartel ship, the Minden, from which they saw the bombardment. "The rocket's red glare, the bombs bursting in air" were watched all night long by the two Americans, torn with anxiety for the fate of their city and country.

The poem was written on an envelope and other scraps of paper during the bombardment and within a few hours afterwards. It was literally the inspiration of a great moment and a moving experience. On the retirement of the defeated fleet, Mr. Key was given his freedom, and the poem was published at once, attaining instant popularity.

Did Francis Scott Key, during the harrowing hours of that summer-night vigil in the storm of battle, realize that he was producing an immortal work? Is it possible that to his poet's soul came later realization that he had written lines which meant undying fame? There are evidences that he did conceive that the great inspiration had raised him to heights he had never touched before. When the poem was printed and circulated in Baltimore he watched its reception with the profoundest interest; he wrote of his gratification that it was so well regarded.

If one, forgetting the music, will ponder that poem of battle and victory and thanksgiving, I think he will comprehend the elements that have made it great—great as a song of patriotism and exaltation, great merely as a piece of poetical portraiture. The first stanza tells the anxiety with which, after the bombardment had ceased, the author peered through the mists of dawn and asked the one question whose answer would tell the fateful story:

* * * Can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hail'd at the twilight's last gleaming, * * *?

In the second stanza he glimpses the banner, and bursts into song of rejoicing. The third stanza is a defiance of the oppressor; and then, in the fourth and last stanza, we find the note of thanksgiving, the prayer that the victory may be justified in the conduct of a race of freemen:

O, thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand
Between their lov'd home and the war's desolation.

That was the poet's prayer. We may fairly claim, in pride for the deeds of our fathers, our sons, our brothers, the prayer has been granted. The faith has been kept.

It is the hope of every American heart to-day that it will continue to be kept. The intervening century has brought our country power and high place. It has cast upon us heavy burdens of responsibility, making us share the difficult problems of a world in the turmoil of a new time. We need all the inspiration and faith which fired his glowing soul of patriotism. No generation of men has ever come into the world to find its path smoothed, or to find its problems solved for it in advance. Solution is the fit price we pay for our great inheritance of liberty and opportunity.

The outstanding and the reassuring thought of to-day is the supreme exaltation of Key, in the hour of great trial, to reveal the soul of a patriot in the night of surpassing anxiety and devotion to country.

No concern for self narrowed his thought. No glorification of the individual marred his vision. No pursuit of fame set his soul ablaze. No personal advantage hindered his pen. His country and his concern for its safety were combined in his all-consuming thought; the Nation was the great, uplifting, and exalting love. In this impassioned, anxious, self-sacrificing, exalting, and exulting love of country, transcending all else, Key reached the sublime heights, and wrote the poetic revelation of an American soul aflame.

If our generation is called to shoulder unprecedented burdens, it may rejoice in unexampled strength. Everlastingly right in the great fundamentals, we may face the future with every confidence, providing men give first of heart and soul to the Republic and its righteous institutions, and give first thought and unfailing devotion to the Nation's perpetuity.

An American citizenship of the high and simple faith of Francis Scott Key, aflame for defense, and no less devoted in meeting the problems of peace, will add to the luster of the banner he so proudly acclaimed. Every glittering star is fixed, every worth-while procession is the more impressive for its bearing, every passion for country is refined by its unfolding. On ships of mercy or vessels of war, in the armed camp or at the memorials of peace, in rejoicing procession or flying from the staff over the simple temples of the schooling youth of America—everywhere it pleases the eye, and reassures the heart and stirs the soul, until we sing in all confidence with the poet-patriot—

The Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the coal strike and on the threatened railroad strike.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on March 30, addressing my remarks to the then threatened coal strike, I said: "Because of the drastic cut in their wages, amounting to one-fourth of the present wage, 500,000 coal miners will go out on a strike April 1, which gives promise of being one of the largest and most bitter industrial struggles in the history of this Nation." To-day there are at least 650,000 coal miners idle and the output of the coal mines in the United States is so small that there will be a terrible coal shortage even if the men should go back to work to-morrow. However, the coal strike is further from a settlement than it was April 1, when the men stopped work.

BLAME OF THE COAL STRIKE RESTS UPON THE MINE OWNERS.

Despite the tons of propaganda and misleading advertisements of the coal operators, the reading public have placed the blame where it unquestionably should be placed, upon the coal operators, who refused to carry out their agreement made with the miners and sanctioned by the Government, to meet the miners and the conciliation board of the Department of Labor. I went into the merits of this controversy between the coal operators and the miners very fully in my speech of March 30, and I think established the fact that the strike might have been averted if the mine operators had kept their agreement or had accepted the urgent request of Commissioner Davis, of the United States Department of Labor, to confer with him. I again call attention to what Secretary of Labor Davis, a high Government official, a member of the President's Cabinet, who speaks as the voice of the President and the administration, says regarding the merits of the controversy:

I have always believed, and every citizen is with me in the belief, that employers and employees who have signed a wage agreement or contract should observe it in spirit and to the letter. If the two parties to a trade dispute get together, it is always possible to work out a satisfactory settlement and maintain peace.

In fairness it must be said that the miners' officials were willing and ready to go into the conference agreed upon, but some of the operators declined to meet.

The operators and miners were bound to a conference; that this conference might have led to a new agreement and the country might not have been confronted with a stoppage of coal production, a suspension avoided, ample supplies of coal and a gradual reduction in price would have resulted.

I can not but express keen disappointment at the failure of certain operators to fulfill the terms of their obligation to meet in conference with a view to peace in the coal industry for two years more.

The Secretary of Labor says further:

There may be faults on both sides of this bituminous dispute, but the side that openly repudiates its written and signed obligations has crippled its case before the bar of public opinion.

The agreement signed by the parties regarding a future conference is as follows:

Resolved, That an interstate joint conference should be held prior to April 1, 1922, the time and place for holding such meeting to be referred to a committee of two operators and two members from each State herein represented, together with the international officials of the United Mine Workers of America.

The mine operators, notwithstanding this solemn agreement, which both parties entered into at the instance of the Government, absolutely refused to keep their agreement, and, taking advantage of the fact that there were millions of men out of employment, gave notice that April 1, 1922, they would reduce the wages of their employees one-fourth of the present wage.

PUBLIC ENTITLED TO THE FACTS.

When the Federal Trade Commission, another Government agency of the highest standing, attempted two years ago to get the facts as to the cost of mining coal and what it could be sold for at a reasonable profit, the coal operators immediately applied to the United States district court and upon their affidavit, with no notice to the Government, obtained an injunction which has prevented the Government from obtaining the desired information. The Federal Trade Commission appealed, but the appeal is still pending. The commission was enjoined on the ground that the coal business was intrastate, and hence the Federal Trade Commission had no jurisdiction. At the same time a State commission in one of our States undertook to investigate the coal operators in that State. The United States court promptly issued an injunction restraining the State commission from proceeding, on the ground that the coal business was interstate. Surely both of these positions can not be right. The Federal Trade Commission has been sustained in 13 out of 14 appeals to the United States Supreme Court. Notwithstanding this splendid record, the district courts go on the presumption that the Federal Trade Commission is always wrong and the corporation right.

Another case of the Federal Trade Commission having its arms tied by the courts was when it started to investigate the Steel Trust under the statute passed by Congress which plainly gave it that power. That case is still pending in the appellate court.

If the Federal Trade Commission could have made its investigation of the coal companies when it attempted to two years ago, the facts would have been known and the present strike prevented.

TRUTH WILL HURT NO ONE.

Why do the owners of the coal mines object to the Government of the United States having the facts as to the cost of mining a ton of coal and delivering it to the producers? Why do they not welcome a conference with Secretary of Labor

Davis? Why are they not willing to meet the representatives of the miners and sit around the table with a member of President Harding's Cabinet and discuss the facts as they agreed in writing to do?

There is only one answer, and that is that they fear the facts. They know that if the truth was brought out, the way it would be by the Federal Trade Commission, they could no longer mislead the public with their propaganda, and the condemnation of 100,000,000 people would rest upon them and compel them to be fair to their employees and fair to the public. If we had known the facts in the time of the war the public would not have allowed 38 per cent of the coal companies to make over 100 per cent profit on their capitalization.

FACT-FINDING AGENCIES SHOULD BE ESTABLISHED.

The first step taken by Congress should be to establish a permanent fact-finding agency on the coal industry. It should be endowed with full power to get and to publish all the facts without the interference of ex parte injunctions. Let the presumption be that the Government agency is right and let the corporation appeal to the courts, and pending the appeal let the decision of the Government agency stand until it is reversed. Now, the presumption seems to be that the Government is always wrong and the corporation right, although, as I have shown, the highest court in the land sustained the Federal Trade Commission in 13 out of 14 cases.

THREATENED RAILROAD STRIKE.

Over 1,200,000 railroad employees directly affected by the drastic wage reduction will go out on a strike July 1. Undoubtedly the strike will be augmented so that it will ultimately result in a strike of over 2,000,000 railroad employees.

The cut in wages of the maintenance-of-way employees brings the wages of these men, they claim, below a living wage. Are the men justified in striking under these circumstances?

LESS THAN A LIVING WAGE.

Under this drastic cut in their wages 100,000 section men will receive a wage of $563.04 a year. The average wage of all section men—more than 250,000—will be $800.50 per year, with reductions for every day lost on account of bad weather, sickness, or a day taken off for a vacation. Divide these amounts by 312 days—the number of working days in a year, figuring 26 working days to the month—and you have 100,000 men working for $1.83 per day and 250,000 men working for an average of $2.59 per day. I challenge anyone to show how a man can live as a human being should live, to say nothing about supporting his family according to American standards, on $1.83 per day or $2.59 per day.

The statisticians of our Government, disinterested and high authorities, figure the cost of living of a family of three according to American standards at not less than $1,800 per year.

Contrast the wages received by these 100,000 men, most of them men with families, working for $1.83 per day, and the 250,000 other employees working for $2.59 per day, with the words and promises of the highest officials of our Government. Take, first, President Harding's splendid utterances. President Harding, speaking in New York May 24, 1921, said:

> In our effort at establishing industrial justice we must see that the wage earner is placed in an economically sound position. His lowest wage must be enough for comfort, enough to make his house a home, enough to insure that the struggle for existence shall not crowd out the things truly worth living for.
> There must be provision for education, for recreation, and a margin for savings.
> There must be such freedom of action as will insure full play to the individual's abilities.

If this splendid sentiment so beautifully expressed by President Harding were carried out in fixing the wages of the laborers of the United States there would be no labor troubles, there would be no discontent, and prosperity and happiness and contentment would follow.

Secretary Davis, a member of President Harding's Cabinet, in defining a "buying and saving wage," said:

> It must be sufficient for even the lowest paid wageworker to be able to purchase the necessaries of a comfortable living based on American standards and to save an amount that will meet the exigencies of a time when the wageworker shall have ceased to be a producer.

Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa, one of the authors of the Esch-Cummins bill, said in a speech April 17, 1922:

> I suppose those who framed the transportation act never dreamed that when the Government undertook to fix wages the wages of any man who was required to work would be less than would be necessary to support him and his family in reasonable comfort.

How can we reconcile these fine sentiments of men in places of power with wages of $1.83 a day and $2.59 a day for men with families to support? These men can not live on splendid-sounding phrases. These words will not buy bread and butter for hungry children, nor shoes and stockings, nor pay coal bills, nor pay exorbitant rents to shelter the laborer and his family from the winter storm.

CHURCH PAPER CONDEMNS CUT IN WAGES.

What does a great church paper say about the drastic cut made in the wages of the railroad workers? The Congregationalist, official organ of the Congregational Church of Massachusetts, a paper that has readers throughout the length and breadth of the United States, has the following editorial on the wage cutting:

> Those who have viewed with hope the tendencies in recent years on the part of large private, public, and semipublic corporations to treat labor as something more than a mere commodity and to bring the wages of unskilled labor a little nearer the standard of reasonable subsistence, will view with regret, if not with a measure of alarm, the great cut in wages of unskilled railroad workers which the Railroad Board, with the three representatives of labor dissenting, has recently ordered. The former scale of wages was considerably below the requirements for the maintenance of life and home, according to what Government experts have established as a reasonable standard. Few of those who will favor this reduction would themselves care to accept that as a personal standard, and all honest and considerate men will recognize that with prices still at a high level the reduced wages are far below any scale of decent living, to say nothing of comfort and proper home life.
> We may rest assured that when any large group of workers are ill housed, ill fed, and ill clad the community ultimately pays the price. Cheap labor is the costliest of all cheap things.
> It is idle to say that labor is a commodity and that the laws of supply and demand are inexorable. That is only partly true. In the higher walks of life more or less arbitrary standards of pay have been established, affording reasonable reward and comfort to the men doing certain work, quite independently of the fact that other men could be secured to do the work as well at lower pay. The recognition of many men in control of public corporations and large industries that wages must have some relation to living conditions has tended to raise the level of wages of unskilled workers everywhere. We deplore, therefore, an example that is likely to have evil effect all around, and we regard as especially inimical to public interest and safety the pushing downward of that great army of workers in "maintenance of way" upon our railroads. If there were no other than a selfish consideration, too much depends upon those workers to risk the weakening of their morale.

LABOR ALWAYS LOYAL.

The laboring classes of this country responded to their country's call in the last war and in every other war we have ever had with an enthusiasm and loyalty that won for them the plaudits of the people.

ENTIRE NATION INVOLVED.

I was informed by the Department of Labor that at the time of the coal strike, April 1, there were at least 5,000,000 men out of employment. Add to this the 650,000 coal miners who are striking because they were not given a living wage, and then add to this 2,000,000 men who will undoubtedly be involved in the threatened railroad strike July 1, and we have 7,650,000 people out of employment. Figuring four persons as dependent upon each wage earner, which is a conservative estimate, and we have over 30,000,000 people without means of support. These 30,000,000 people will cease to be purchasers except to a very limited extent, for idle men and women have very little to purchase with. Every line of industry in the United States will, of course, suffer. As Secretary of Labor Davis said:

> If each of the 7,097,283 women clerks and wage earners in the United States and the wives and daughters of the 23,346,373 men clerks and wage workers in the United States could buy another cotton dress, another woolen dress, another silk dress, the question of unemployment in the textile industries would be solved. And what is true of textiles is true of nearly all other industries.
> Reduce wages to that of the Chinese coolie, and you close the factories of the United States, you close the coal mines, and you stop the railroads.

The Secretary of Labor further says that in paying the American worker in terms of a buying and saving wage "we are not giving capital away; we are bringing new brains and enterprise into the use of capital."

Take again the tremendous loss in wages of 7,650,000 men out of employment, at a wage of $3 per day, the minimum wage fixed by Congress in the District of Columbia, and you have a loss in wages alone of $22,950,000 a day. Besides this, the amount of loss in what these men would produce would amount to many times their wages. Economists say that the coal strike has already resulted in a loss of over $500,000,000.

ECONOMIC LOSS NOT AS GREAT AS OTHER LOSSES.

The economic loss to the Nation, although very great, is small in comparison with other ills that follow unemployment. What will be the effect upon the 30,000,000 people involved in this unemployment? There will be an increase of tuberculosis and other diseases that feed on undernourished children and men and women; you will have millions of excellent citizens embittered and resentful and desperate because they are out of work and out of money and unable to purchase food; crime is always more prevalent and many other curses always follow in the wake of unemployment and poverty.

ENTIRE NATION SUFFERS.

With the coal mines being operated in only a small way and the scarcity of coal becoming greater every day, so that it is inevitable that there will be a shortage the coming winter even if the strike should stop now and the railroads should be run to their greatest capacity, it means that the prices for coal will be prohibitive and if obtainable at all will be only within the reach of the well to do, and many will be unable to keep from freezing. When we augment the situation caused by the coal strike with the railroad strike, the textile strikes, and the unemployment, we are facing the greatest crisis that ever confronted this Nation.

SUPERCORPORATIONS.

The same powerful interests that own the coal mines own the railroads. In my speech on March 30 on the threatened coal strike I gave a list of the powerful financial interests who, through their interlocking directorates, control the output of coal. I also showed how these same interests control the greater portion of the country's steam transportation system. I gave the names of 25 men who control 82 per cent of the country's steam transportation system, operating 211,280 miles of railroad.

I repeat this statement and at the close of the extension of my remarks I am giving the names of the railroads and other corporations in which these men hold directorships. My authority is the Directory of Directors of the City of New York, the latest print that was available in the Congressional Library being from 1919 to 1920. This work is issued by the Audit Co. of New York, 14 Wall Street, New York, and is considered authentic.

Take, for example, J. P. Morgan & Co., the Guaranty Trust Co., the Bankers Trust Co., and the First National Bank of New York. Back in 1913, in the Money Trust investigations by Congress, these five financial institutions held 89 directorships in various banks and trust companies, 29 directorships in insurance companies, 78 directorships in transportation systems, 49 directorships in producing and trading corporations, and 16 directorships in public utility corporations; in all, 261 directorships. (Page 997, vol. 10–20, U. S. Money Trust Investigation.) The wealth of these companies has been augmented very much in the last 10 years.

Take, for another example, the Chase National Bank, of New York, one of the powerful financial interests. Back in 1912, at the time of the Money Trust investigation, the Chase National Bank had 22 directorships in 10 of the largest banks and trust companies.

The National Bank of Commerce of New York in 1912 had 57 directorships in 22 large banks and trust companies, these banks and trust companies having resources of over $2,000,000,000. This bank also had at that time 21 directorships in 9 insurance companies, including the Equitable and the Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Railroad labor need not expect any mercy from these people, because they are the same interests that have brought on the coal strike. They are the same interests that have oppressed the laboring men in the steel industry, which was condemned in a most scathing report of the interchurch committee that investigated the steel industry three years ago.

LEST WE FORGET.

The exploitation of the railroads of the United States by their officials and directors has repeatedly been a national scandal. The crédit mobilier, in 1873, involved directors of railroads, judges, and legislators. Anyone that is interested can get from the library the Poland Report No. 77. Another inquiry was made into the affairs of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. and like conditions unearthed and can be found in the Wilson Report No. 78.

Skipping over these earlier railroad scandals, I take up the reports of the United States Interstate Commerce Commission, rendered from 1914 to 1917, in re financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., docket No. 6569. Report of the investigation of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad and others, docket No. 5933. In re Pere Marquette Railroad Co. and Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Co., docket No. 6833. Investigation of the financial transactions, history, and operation of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., docket No. 6834. In re financial relations, rates, and practices of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., docket No. 6319.

If you read these reports you will see how the railroads have been exploited by these same men—the Morgans, Vanderbilts, and Rockefellers—that are now controlling the railroad systems of this country.

I have not the time to quote extensively from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who have condemned in the strongest way the practices of these railroad officials in exploiting these railroads. I will quote briefly a few extracts from the report on the New Haven scandal:

THE NEW HAVEN SCANDAL.

The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, on June 30, 1903, with a total mileage of 2,040 miles, had a total capitalization of $93,000,000, of which $79,000,000 was stock and $14,000,000 bonds.

On June 30, 1912, the capitalization, excluding stock premiums, had been increased to $417,000,000, an increase of $324,000,000 in nine years, although in that time mileage operated had only been increased 50 miles. (See Reports of Interstate Commerce Commission, vol. 27 and vol. 31, which disclose the details of the scandalous history of the New Haven Railroad.)

FALSIFICATION OF BOOKS.

The extent of the fraudulent methods of the New Haven road is illustrated by the following extract from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

As one illustration of the devious financial operations of this railroad let us take the undisputed facts appearing of record as to shifting of funds to show dividends earned in the year 1912, as exhibited in the annual accounts. This is not an isolated case, but was more in the nature of a practice with the subsidiary companies, as the investigation discloses.

To make up its own income account, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. reported as receiving certain sums as dividends on stocks owned and controlled, the largest of which appears to be a dividend of $2,252,500 from the New England Navigation Co., which was paid, according to the record, on June 26 and 29, 1912.

* * * * * * *

The effect of the transaction means that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. advanced $2,000,000 in cash for another company to pay to it dividends on its stock and included the amount so advanced in its income as a dividend received. In other words, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. set up in its income account an item of $2,000,000 on one side and an asset consisting of $2,000,000 in paper on the other side.

* * * * * * *

The accounts of the company are replete with instances in which profits have been declared to be earned by the transfer of stock, bonds, debentures, and securities of one of the subordinate and subsidiary companies of the New Haven system to another such subsidiary company, and such profits are solemnly recorded as real profits in making up the account of the system as a whole.

Is it right to deny a living wage to the laborers who make it possible for the railroad companies to operate their lines? In other words, is the dollar to be placed above the man?

I have taken up just one of the groups of railroad employees affected by the Labor Board's decision. The second decision affected the so-called "shop crafts," including machinists, boilermakers, blacksmiths, sheet-metal workers, electrical workers, car men, and so forth. The third decision had to do with the clerical forces, stationary firemen, engineers, oilers, and the signal department employees.

An equally strong case could be made against the cut in the wages of the above group included in decisions Nos. 2 and 3. The public has been misled by the propaganda and extensive advertising of the railroad companies to believe that the engineers and other employees of the railroads were receiving extremely high wages. The true facts have been brought to light by data collected by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Railroad Labor Board. According to the carefully compiled figures of the Railroad Labor Board the average daily earnings of the engineers are as follows:

	Per day.
Passenger engineer	$6.00
Through freight engineer	7.05
Local freight engineer	7.44

This includes overtime as well as regular pay, and is the total daily compensation received by the average engineer since July 1, 1921, when decision No. 147 of the Labor Board was rendered.

In the same report there is also given the average monthly wage received by engineers, which indicates that many of them do not work full time. The highest average wage stated is but $185.93 per month, which tapers to $119.56 for yard and local engineers per month.

When we consider the great responsibility of the engineer, the number of lives that are dependent upon his careful, vigilant, and skilled service, also the fact that an engineer has to measure up to the highest physical test—so severe that 17 per cent of the firemen who aspire to become engineers are rejected at the end of three years because their eyesight becomes impaired by the fierce glare of a grate of coal throwing off 2,800 degrees of heat, and an additional 76 per cent failing to exhibit the temperament and natural ability required of an engineer, so that only 17 out of every 100 candidates ever become engineers—we can not help but come to the conclusion that engineers have certainly never been overpaid.

RAILROADS INSIST ON LARGE RETURNS FOR THEIR INVESTMENT.

While the railroads are demanding that the workers' wages be reduced, they are insisting that the wages of the dollar—the returns on the capital they have invested—shall be increased. During the war the Government paid the railroads $906,000,000 a year rental, which was supposed to be the average of their net income during the most profitable years of their existence, 1915, 1916, and 1917. Senator CUMMINS said this was so high that it "shocked the moral sense of mankind," and he claimed it should be reduced by $200,000,000. In its latest decision the Interstate Commerce Commission has authorized the railroads to collect 5¾ per cent on $18,900,000,000, which would amount to $1,086,750,000, or $180,000,000 more than the Government paid during the war.

But the railroads are not satisfied. During the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission their authorized spokesmen demanded 6 per cent on a valuation of $30,000,000,000.

We hear the claim made that the railroads have been skimped during recent years. They certainly were not skimped when the Government paid them $906,000,000 a year rental.

In 1918, the first year of Government control, the Government spent $622,000,000 more on maintenance than had been expended in 1917 and over $700,000,000 more than had been expended in 1916. In 1919 the Government expended on maintenance, and so forth, $297,000,000 more than the preceding year, and in 1920, eight months of which were under Government control or Government guaranty, $625,000,000 more was spent on maintenance, and so forth, than the preceding year.

These figures are sustained by the testimony before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, and can be found in the testimony of Dr. Frank J. Warne, a statistician and economist of national reputation.

These figures corroborate the statement of Walker D. Hines, former Director of Railroads, and William G. McAdoo, who testified before the same committee, and ought to put at rest the statement that the railroads were starved during Government control.

THE COMPANIES THAT REDUCE WAGES HAVE NOT REDUCED THEIR COMMODITIES.

Coal and gasoline continue to rise in price and are higher now than at any time in the war. At the signing of the armistice, November, 1918, anthracite coal, according to the operators' own figures, sold at the mouth of the mine for $6.10. October, 1920, two years afterwards, when farm produce had deflated so that it was selling for less than the cost of production, anthracite coal sold at the mouth of the mine for $7.95, $1.85 per ton in advance of two years previous and $2.90 more than it did December 1, 1917, when we were engaged in war and when the companies were making over 100 per cent profits.

The following are figures furnished by the anthracite operators themselves:

In 1902 anthracite coal sold for $3.75 per ton at the mouth of the mine. The price stayed about the same when it was raised to $4 per ton in 1912. The following gives the cost of coal at the mouth of the mine.

	Per ton.
June, 1912	$4.00
May, 1916	4.40
May, 1917	4.70
December, 1917	5.05
November, 1918	6.10
August, 1919	6.60
April, 1920	7.45
October, 1920	7.95

CONCLUSION.

It is an open boast of the great financiers who have obtained their great wealth largely through the acquirement and monopolization of great natural resources, who are the owners of the railroads, coal mines, and who control iron, steel, copper, petroleum, and so forth, that they are going to destroy organized labor. They are going to attempt to do this if they stop production, paralyze the industries of the country, and let gaunt famine stalk throughout the land. They are appealing to the Government and courts to aid them. Will the Federal Government lend its aid to such purpose? I can not believe that it will when I read the message of President Harding delivered before Congress December 6, 1921, in which he said:

> The right of labor to organize is just as fundamental and necessary as is the right of capital to organize. The right of labor to negotiate, to deal with and solve its particular problems in an organized way, through its chosen agents, is just as essential as is the right of capital to organize, to maintain corporations to limit the liabilities of stockholders. Indeed, we have come to recognize that the limited liability of the citizen as a member of a labor organization closely parallels the limitation of liability of the citizen as a stockholder in a corporation for profit. Along this line of reasoning we shall make the greatest progress toward solution of our problem of capital and labor.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 16, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

646. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

647. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a complete set of general rules and regulations prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, Steamboat Inspection Service, at the meeting of January, 1922, which regulations have been approved by the Secretary of Commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. COLTON: Committee on the Public Lands. S. 2460. An act to extend the provisions of section 18a of an act approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stats., p. 437), to certain lands in Utah; without amendment (Rept. No. 1104). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McKENZIE: Committee on Military Affairs. S. 2363. An act to abolish the limitation on military service without the continental limits of the United States imposed by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915; without amendment (Rept. No. 1103). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FROTHINGHAM: Committee on Military Affairs. S. 3307. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to the city of Springfield, Mass., certain streets within the Springfield Armory Military Reservation, Mass., and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1103). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DALLINGER (by request): A bill (H. R. 12031) to incorporate the World Commerce Corporation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 12032) to allow officers and employees of the United States to be commissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps and to receive pay and allowances when on active duty; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 12033) to amend section 47c of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of Congress approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McSWAIN: A bill (H. R. 12034) authorizing the use of a special canceling stamp in a certain post office; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12035) to establish a bureau of prohibition, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. REED of West Virginia: Resolution (H. Res. 366) authorizing an investigation of alleged conduct of the Naval Academy class of 1922 toward Leonard Kaplan, a member of that class; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 12036) granting a pension to Ellen Mary Tweedy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURROUGHS: A bill (H. R. 12037) granting a pension to Peter Masterson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 12038) granting a pension to Abigail J. Gardner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILLETT: A bill (H. R. 12039) for the relief of Howard R. Gurney; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARDY of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 12040) granting a pension to Frank E. Jacobs; to the Committee on Pensions.

6012. By Mr. WASON: Petition of Rev. P. E. Miller and 59 other residents of Henniker, N. H., in favor of having our Government take such immediate and drastic measures as it may deem advisable in delivering the Armenian people out of the hands of the Turkish power; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

6013. By Mr. YOUNG: Resolution of Bismarck Rotary Club, Bismarck, N. Dak., in respect to the reclamation of land and control of flood waters in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys; to the Committee on Flood Control.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	McKinley	Shortridge
Borah	Glass	McNary	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	Myers	Smoot
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Johnson	Newberry	Sutherland
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Swanson
Culberson	Kellogg	Norbeck	Townsend
Curtis	Kendrick	Norris	Trammell
Dial	Keyes	Oddie	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Ladd	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	La Follette	Phipps	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Poindexter	Willis
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene
France	McCormick	Ransdell
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia], due to illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I announce that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present petitions, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of Boston, Roxbury, Roslindale, Weymouth, and Dorchester, in the State of Massachusetts, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that the prayer of one of the petitions, which is brief, may be printed in the RECORD without the names.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the United States Senators:

The killing and burning alive of human beings by mobs in the United States is a reproach upon our country throughout the civilized world and threatens organized government in the Nation.

Since 1889 there have been 3,443 known mob murders, 64 of the victims being women. In only a few instances has prosecution of the lynchers been even attempted. American mobs murdered 64 persons in 1921, of whom 4 were publicly burned at stake.

The House of Representatives on January 26, 1922, in response to insistent country-wide demand, passed the Dyer antilynching bill, which invokes the power of the Federal Government to end the infamy of American mob murder.

This bill is now in the hands of the United States Senate. The undersigned United States citizens earnestly urge its prompt enactment.

Mr. GERRY. Some days ago I submitted a resolution protesting against the food, tableware, and women's wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill. I now present similar protests from Annette B. Thayer, Miss Alice W. Hunt, and Mrs. Frank Gibson, all of Providence, R. I. I ask that one of the memorials may be printed in the RECORD and that they all be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorials were referred to the Committee on Finance and one was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. PETER G. GERRY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Will you please read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following resolution, and have a copy of the RECORD containing it sent me:

"Resolved, That we protest against the food, tableware, and women's wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill. These schedules will increase the costs of living in every American home. They are fines levied by American men upon American women and upon American children. They should not be allowed to become law."

Yours truly,

ANNETTE BRADFORD THAYER,
149 Congress Avenue, Providence, R. I.

Mr. CULBERSON presented the memorial of Mrs. Charles H. Mills, corresponding secretary, Civic Club, of Corsicana, Tex., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That we protest against the food, tableware, and women's wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill. These schedules will increase the costs of living in every American home. They are fines levied by American men upon American women and upon American children. They should not be allowed to become law.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Reese, Saginaw, Miller, and Munger, all in the State of Michigan, praying for inclusion in the pending tariff bill of a duty of $2 per 100 pounds on Cuban sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying that only a moderate duty be imposed on kid gloves in the pending tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorials of Joseph J. Schaefer, of Dayton; E. J. Yost, of Lima; and sundry other cigarmakers and their employees of Dayton, Lima, Bucyrus, Bellefontaine, Findlay, Minster, Van Wert, Sidney, Toledo, Fostoria, Ottawa, Celina, and Wapakoneta, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the imposition of a higher rate of duty on wrapper tobacco in the pending tariff bill than $1.85 per pound, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Franklin County Retailers' Association, of Ottawa, Kans., favoring the prompt acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, including the Gorgas plant, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 171) to extend the provisions of the act of May 11, 1912, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 775) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 451) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 777) thereon.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2568) to amend section 196 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 776) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KEYES:

A bill (S. 3714) granting a pension to Francis Roy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3715) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation and enrolled members of such nation; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3716) to define a period in which certain claims may be presented for determination to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for refund of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates of decedents under color of section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," and amendments; and to authorize payment of amounts allowed in the determination of such claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 3717) to amend sections 4826 and 4827 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to Board of Managers of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 3718) for the relief of H. Frank Adkins;

A bill (S. 3719) for the relief of Harry Ross Hubbard; and

A bill (S. 3720) for the relief of Stella M. Musselman; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 3721) authorizing the appropriation of additional funds to continue in effect the act providing for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy and to prevent the spread of leprosy in the United States; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HARRELD:

A bill (S. 3722) granting a pension to Sadie Hatch; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 210) conveying the thanks of Congress to Dr. James Harris Rogers, of Hyattsville, Md., the discoverer of underground and underwater radio; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 211) empowering the President to take such measures as may be required to secure for the United States of America or its nationals dyestuffs and chemical drugs under section 1, article 2, of the treaty of peace between the United States of America and Germany, proclaimed November 14, 1921; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LENROOT.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, on Monday of this week the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] delivered a very able address before the graduating classes of the University of Delaware. The address deals with the dangers confronting our Republic. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF DELAWARE, JUNE 12, 1922.

Senator LENROOT spoke as follows:

"Never has the word 'commencement' as applied to the graduating exercises of a college been so significant as now. Graduation involves the beginning of a new life, but to-day we all, old and young, educated and uneducated, are beginning a new life. The greatest war in history has been fought, and the world will never be the same again. It is being reborn, but whether for better or worse the future alone will reveal. Europe is in chaos. Its people are torn with hate and burning with jealousies that bode ill for the future, but whatever may happen in Europe it is for us to resolve that America shall not fail—that not only shall the progress already made be secure, but we shall go on climbing upward to higher levels of justice and equity.

"Those of us who are primarily charged with responsibility for government will soon pass away and our places will be taken by the young men and women with you now entering from college into the great school of life. The kind of a Government we shall have 20 years from now and the ideals and purposes of our people then depend upon you. I have an abiding confidence that because of colleges like this and the true spirit of patriotism which they are inculcating we shall have a better America then than now.

"Delaware is one of the smallest States of the Union, both in area and population, but it has a most honorable place in our history. Two outstanding events should fill every native of Delaware with pride—that of being the first State to ratify the Federal Constitution, and in the Civil War, although a slave-holding State, she adhered to the Union and with her meager population gave Lincoln nearly 14,000 troops to help save the Union.

"I envy you young men and women your future. The opportunities before you for service, for true success in life, are unlimited. We must determine that out of the Great War in which we have been engaged shall come a new America. The great social and economic problems confronting us now must be met and solved, not from the standpoint of any class or section, but from the standpoint of the Nation. What is this America of ours? America does not consist of mines and fields and factories, it does not consist of towering buildings and gigantic industries; America consists of living, breathing men and women, and their throbbing hearts is America. What it has been we know, what it shall be is for them and their descendants to decide. But this I know—that if America is to endure, it must be a land where law and order reign, where enlightened public opinion shall determine the laws, where the aspirations of the people shall not be governed by wealth and greed, but the welfare of all shall be the aim and purpose of the individual. We have our responsibility to America now, and that is to uphold the best traditions of our past, and do what we can to make to-morrow better than to-day, not for some of us but for all of us. We must protect the individual incentive and ambition of men and women to a wider degree than in the past. Every man and woman must be given a chance to achieve the best things in life, so that success or failure will depend upon them alone. We must make of America to an ever-increasing degree a land where the highest ideals of man shall find their full fruition. We must by wise legislation protect every man in every sphere, protect him in his individual rights and in his property, and furnish incentive to every laudable ambition.

"Knowledge is power and if used for selfish purposes alone it becomes an instrument of oppression to one's fellows. Higher education should and nearly always does make a man better morally and spiritually. If it does not do that it is a failure. A man may have a trained mind, he may have great ability, but unless he has with them character he is a failure. The man who advocates a rule of conduct for others but does not practice it himself is a hypocrite. We find men in politics sometimes who seldom practice what they preach. In this reconstruction period and in the years before us there will be discontented elements and the demagogue will be abroad in the land. We must face men who are always looking back upon the path we have come, never forward, and insisting that everything must be placed back where it used to be—the evil with the good. We must face men who seem to think that government can by some magic of law make over men. We will at one extreme find men who advocate that the Government can do everything for the people without individual effort themselves, and at the other extreme men who do not believe in any government at all, and curiously enough we sometimes find these two classes of men working together to overthrow the existing order. It is education we must rely upon to meet our problems. We must have the man with trained mind and the principles of justice and liberty firmly fixed in him. He must be big enough in mind and heart, in seeking justice for his own vocation or calling, to see to it that injustice is not done to others. If he belongs to organized labor he must realize that tyranny of labor is as unjust as is tyranny of capital. If he is a capitalist or manufacturer he must realize that he has no more right to drive a hard bargain with labor than labor has to drive a hard bargain with capital; that if he would have his employees recognize his just rights he must recognize their just rights. No man can be a good citizen who would follow the simple plan that—

"They shall take who have the power,
And they shall keep who can.

"In our efforts to preserve individual opportunity for all men we must be careful lest we destroy it. Equality of opportunity does not mean that a man shall be prevented from advancing faster than his fellows. Each man must be given a fair chance to advance, but given the opportunity his rate of progress must depend upon himself alone. While we must provide equality of opportunity we must also protect the rewards of industry and perseverance. The man who loafs his way through life, doing nothing for society or himself, is usually the man who cries out loudest against the inequality of wealth, and if every man was compelled to earn his living by the sweat of his brow, he still would be the first to complain. The idler, whether millionaire or hobo, rendering no service to mankind, are both parasites upon the body politic.

"Another duty imposed upon us is to more fully Americanize America. This is said to be the melting pot of nations. Anyone who comes here from other lands who is not willing to be melted into a good American citizen should not be permitted to remain. There must be no little Germany, no little Italy, and no other little nationality here, but just one big America. We should make it clear to every immigrant that his entry here is a privilege and not a right; that for that privilege he must not only obey our laws but cheerfully support them; that he must learn our language and become acquainted with our institutions; that until he acquires the status of citizenship it is not for him to criticize our Government or advocate a change in its laws. We should say to him that to citizens of America alone belongs the right and privilege of government, and that until he is naturalized if he does not like our country as it is, even though it has faults, and advocates tearing it down, he had better go back to the land from whence he came or we will send him there.

"This is a land of freedom, of freedom of speech for American citizens, but the alien must first acquire the right to criticize before he can rightfully claim the privilege of freedom of speech. To-day the most fruitful field of the demagogue is among our foreign-born citizens. Most of them have come from countries where government means oppression, and there are men in America whose chief business is to tell them that our Government, too, is oppressive—men who appeal to every racial prejudice and who proffer friendship for them, but have neither sympathy nor care for them except as they can use them. If I should be asked to name the greatest enemy of America to-day, I would not go outside of America nor would I select any foreign-born in America. It is the political demagogue, willfully deceiving others, thinking only of his own advancement, caring not what may become of the Republic, if only his own political fortunes can be advanced. His presence is not confined to any political party, for he is found in all parties. He can not be imprisoned, and there is only one weapon with which he can be destroyed, and that is enlightened, patriotic public opinion. That public opinion must be created, and you, each one, no matter what your vocation in life may be, have a responsibility in helping to create it.

"There can be no stability to our Government, no security for our people, unless we shall be obedient to and have respect for the laws of the land. This is the corner stone upon which all civilization is founded. Without respect for law there can be no safety for life or property, no liberty for any man who is not stronger than his fellows, no rule of right but only of might.

"We may look down the corridors of time to the earliest beginnings of civilization and we will see that the first emergence from savagery was through the institution of rules of conduct, or law, first to govern the family, next to govern the tribe or clan, from there going on and upward until a national life is developed. Despotisms have come and gone, Republics have flourished and fallen into decay, but no civilization anywhere has ever succeeded without organized governments enacting laws for the people, and no Republic has ever fallen where the citizen fulfilled his obligations and respected its laws.

"If this great Republic of ours, in which civilization has found its highest expression, shall some day fall and occupy only a page in history, like the ancient Republics of Greece and Rome, it will be because of disrespect for law, indifference to the fundamental rights of liberty, and through such indifference failure to enact and enforce laws, without which there can be neither liberty nor security for our people. To-day our greatest national problem is not foreign entanglements, not the tariff, not transportation, or other problems which we deem important, but it is disrespect for law—unwillingness to abide by the laws of the land. Everywhere there seems to be lessened respect for law, and this constitutes the greatest menace that confronts the Nation to-day. Some men try to justify this disrespect for law upon the plea that the laws are unjust. But to permit every man to decide for himself whether a law is just or not, and not be bound by it if he believes it unjust, spells anarchy and ruin. There must be implanted in the hearts of the men and women of America the determination that the laws must be obeyed, and the man who excuses or makes light of violation of law is himself guilty. The deliberate violator of law is an enemy of the Republic and is not worthy of citizenship in it. I thoroughly believe in the declaration that the best way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it. It is the right of every citizen to advocate the repeal of any law, but he has no right to disobey it while it is in force. In this country the people make the laws through their representatives and they can repeal them in the same way they are made. But unless obeyed while in force, there is not an institution in America that can long endure. Without general acquiescence in obedience to law there can be no protection to life or property. Your life would not be safe to-day but for law and the officers and machinery to enforce it. Your savings of a lifetime would be swept away at the demand of the man with a gun, and the man with a gun would be on every corner if there be general disrespect for law. We are proud of the glorious past of our country and we wish for it an even more glorious future—a future where, as in the past, rewards of industry may be protected and secure, where men shall have the opportunity and the incentive to make the best of their lives with the knowledge that they have a Government supported by the people protecting them in their every right. This can only be secured through respect for our Government and obedience to its laws.

"I have already said that the future of this country depends upon you, and the young men and women of your age and your responsibility to our country begins now. As good citizens you should each one study public problems and do your part in solving them. One of the dangers that confronts us to-day is that of class government. A very considerable part of our population is divided into groups, each group demanding that Government be conducted for its special benefit with little regard for the rights of others. It should be our aim to do justice to every honorable vocation, but we need a national vision, and in the making of laws there should be neither sectionalism or class legislation. Special privilege to the public injury should never be given to capital, labor, agriculture, or any other interest. He is not a true American who will not stand first and always for the common welfare, who will not encompass in his vision our great country from coast to coast and recognize that America is not confined to any place within its borders or any particular group of people.

"I have an abiding confidence in the future of our country because of the sterling character and the true Americanism of the thousands who, with you, are leaving college life and assuming the responsibilities of citizenship. You will go out in the world appreciating not only your opportunities but your obligations. You will realize that there is only one way by which your obligation can be fulfilled, and that is service; service to your country, service to your fellow man. The acquirement of wealth will not be your primary ambition in life. If it is, your life will be a failure. That you will be ambitious to acquire a competence is altogether worthy, and if in that you shall be successful you should realize that it affords you larger opportunities for service.

"You go out into the great world and in going you have my most earnest hope for true success, and my confidence that you will each contribute your full share for the welfare of America. I believe I know the hearts and the patriotism of the American people. They will not forget our past, and upon it they will build its future. They will never cease to make possible the blessings we now enjoy. So long as men have tongues to speak and hands to write, the sacrifices which have been made for America, from Bunker Hill to Gettysburg, and from Gettysburg to the battle fields of France shall never be forgotten. The experience of the past shall be our guide to the future. Conserving all that is good we shall progress to higher things, and although great social and economic problems confront us, and dark clouds may at times gather round about us, with that faith which guided the fathers we, too, shall be guided and do our part to make America so great that it shall rear like a mountain peak in the world's civilization, pointing the way of peace and happiness to all the world."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CRAMTON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11872) to amend sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Panama Canal act; to amend sections 288, 289, 342, 343, 368, and 461 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone; and section 2 of the Executive order of July 9, 1914, establishing rules and regulations for the operation and navigation of the Panama Canal and approaches thereto, including all water under its jurisdiction; to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provisions as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and to regulate divorces in the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE PRIMARY ELECTION SYSTEM.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the morning papers announce that Secretary of War Weeks delivered an address in Cleveland, Ohio, yesterday in which he bemoaned the present tendency of citizens of our country toward various kinds of reform in government. The Secretary made a specific attack against primaries, and while it is true he announced that he was speaking for himself only, everybody knows that he promulgated ideas that were in harmony with those promulgated by President Harding. So the ideas he advanced were as much those of his chief as his own, even though they were not uttered officially.

I do not intend this morning to engage in a detailed discussion of the primary in its advantages and its shortcomings, but it seems to me that the address of the Secretary of War ought not to pass unnoticed lest the silence of those who do not agree with him may be taken as an approval of his utterances.

I do not impugn the motives of Secretary Weeks or of President Harding in their advocacy of the abolishment of the primary system of nominating candidates for public office. I concede, to begin with, that they are just as honest in their convictions as I am in mine. Later, before I conclude, if I do not forget it, I shall have something to say about men, great and small, being oftentimes unconsciously biased by their own interests. For the present I wish to say that I believe the Secretary of War is just as conscientious in his ideas and his desires to abolish the primary as I am to retain it.

But, Mr. President, in a free government founded upon the consent of the governed, on the theory that the people are sufficiently intelligent to be given the right of self-government, no man, in my judgment, can successfully deny the right of the people to nominate candidates, unless at the same time he is consistent and denies the right of the people to vote at general elections. A primary is nothing but an election. It is just as important as, and nine times out of ten it is more important than, the election which follows. Give to me or to anyone else or to any machine or any body of men the right and power to nominate candidates for office, and they will not turn their finger over to decide as to who shall be chosen at the general election. The history of the country is full of such examples.

We saw the last national presidential convention of the Republican Party controlled by a sick man in Philadelphia, and following that convention we saw the Democratic national convention controlled by a sick man in the White House. Neither one of the nominees of those conventions would have been nominated if the question of the nomination had been submitted to the voters in America.

Abolish the right of the people to name their candidates and the effect will be the abolition of the right of people to elect their public officials. The Secretary of War when he advocates the abolishment of the primary is in reality advocating the return to a monarchial form of government. The men who want to take away from the people the right to nominate their candidates do it on the theory that the people are not sufficiently intelligent to select their officials. The same argument, with the same weight and the same logic, applies to the general election. So, Mr. President, often it turns out that the election is nothing in the world but a choice between two evils. The machinery that has controlled the nominations has indirectly but effectively controlled the election.

The Secretary of War in his address bemoans the tendency of the times, but while he is worried a great deal he does think that the Government will be able to stand it; that it will live through it all. No man can get any other impression from reading his address than that the Secretary of War believes that the only way to save the country is to stop the demand of the people for self-government. A people who are too ignorant, who are too unintelligent to nominate their candidates for office, are not entitled to vote at elections, are not entitled to self-government, and ought to be living under a monarchial form of government. If I believed that our people were not sufficiently intelligent to nominate their candidates for office, I would advocate the establishment of a monarchy in America; I would be consistent at least; and, if I were not able to get a monarchy, I would surrender my citizenship in the United States of America and go to some country where there is a monarchy, if I liked a monarchy better.

From the very beginning of civilization, Mr. President, there has been a contest between those who wanted to go forward and those who were pulling back. There has been a continual conflict in the history of every government which has ever been founded between those who wanted the power given to a few chosen people and those who wanted to give it to all the people. I think it is conceded that a people may be so unintelligent and lacking in education to such an extent that they are not competent to vote in either a general election or in a primary or to participate in the selection of men who shall govern them. To my mind whenever we attempt in America to take away from the people any of the power they now possess, either in voting at general elections or in primaries, we are in effect saying that the American people are not sufficiently intelligent to govern themselves.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. It seems to me that the Senator from Nebraska is discussing but one phase of the speech of the Secretary of War. Personally I do not entirely agree with the Secretary with reference to the question of direct primaries, but I most heartily agree with the Secretary in his most eloquent plea for a return to the old principles of constitutional government as they were enunciated by the fathers.

Referring to what the Senator from Nebraska has said, I desire to ask him if he does not believe that this lack of faith in the moral and spiritual capacity of the people to govern themselves is not also expressed by the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, the eighteenth amendment having, in my judgment, been written in an entire lack of faith in the people's ability to govern themselves. Whenever any kind of statute is written into the Constitution of the United State it must be written there to remove from the people jurisdiction over the question involved. It seems to me that the writing of the prohibition statute into the Constitution was the result of a lack of faith in the capacity of the people of the United States to govern themselves. It was on that principle that I opposed it. Personally I care not as to whether the people of the United States vote for prohibition or whether they do not; but I do feel that there is a general lack of faith in the capacity of the people of the United States for self-government, and that lack of faith, it seems to me, has been more clearly demonstrated by the adoption of the eighteenth amendment than in any other way. I opposed it because I am opposed to writing any kind of a statute into the Constitution of the United States which should be a framework of government. I am opposed to any kind of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States except an amendment which enlarges the power of the people over their own affairs instead of decreasing it.

The great Secretary of War—and I believe him to be a very great man and a public-spirited man and a man who understands the trend of the times—expressed the view that one of the causes of unrest in this country is the taking away from the people of control of the particular question involved in the eighteenth amendment.

I thank the Senator. I did not mean to make an address, but I intended to ask him a question as to whether——

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; the Senator is getting to the point. Let him ask the question.

Mr. FRANCE. I have already asked it. I will repeat it.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the question?

Mr. FRANCE. Does not the Senator believe that the eighteenth amendment was written because of a lack of faith in the capacity of the people of the United States ultimately wisely to determine for themselves through the action of their legislators what should be done with reference to that particular question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the Senator with a much less number of words than it took to propound it. I simply say, No; I do not believe anything of the kind. I do not, however, wish to be diverted from what I am talking about by a discussion of the eighteenth amendment. I am talking mainly about the primary system, although I have no objection to discussing the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, my question will be directed explicitly to the primary system.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BALL. I should like to ask the Senator if this is not a representative Government, a republican Government, and not a democratic Government, strictly speaking?

Mr. NORRIS. It is not a pure democracy. I think a pure democracy in practice in such a country as ours is an impossibility.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does not a truly representative government involve upon the part of the people the right of selection as well as election of their representatives?

Mr. BALL. It does, Mr. President, but good government requires the best men to be named for the various offices.

Mr. NORRIS. And, according to the belief of the men who are opposed to the primary system, the only way to select the best men is to turn the matter over to a particular few, who, by some inherited right, are assuming to themselves that they know more than anybody else, and they must necessarily be entrusted with the power. They are doing what the Kaiser did when he said that he derived his power from God. They are assuming that they are superior to somebody else.

Our Government is founded upon the principle, as our forefathers said, although it is not quoted much now, that all men are created free and equal; that God has given to men certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that to attain these ends governments are established among men, deriving their just powers—note the word "just"—from whom? The bosses? The machine? The few elect who have said "We are the only men who know how to run a government"? No. Our forefathers did not say that, but "deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." That means me, that means you, that means the bricklayer, that means the carpenter, that means the farmer between the plow handles, that means the lawyer and the doctor and the dentist and the scientific men, as well as the man who has had only one training, and that is to know how to compute compound interest and not lose anything by the operation.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if our forefathers selected their candidates by the common primary or by the convention method?

Mr. NORRIS. No; they did not. Our forefathers lived more than 100 years ago. If I believed that all progress was ended at the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, if I believed that there never would be another improvement made in science and agriculture and education or in government, then I would agree with the Senator that we ought to stop there and never make a change.

Mr. President, I said a while ago, or started to say, that the history of civilization has been a contest between those who wanted to progress and those who did not want to progress, those who were in the rut and wanted to stay there, between the reactionary and the progressive. That has been the history of the world from the beginning. I hope, Mr. President, when I lay down the cares of office and my descendants commence where I left off, that in 50 years from now they will not say that when I lived we did not have this thing or that thing. I hope they will improve upon what I did, as I try to improve upon the work of those who have passed on before. The abolishment of the primary is a backward step. It is a denial of the people to participate in government. A representative democracy can not permanently stand if the people are denied the right to name their officials, and this right is denied if the law is such that a few self-appointed bosses do the selecting of candidates for office. The right to vote at election is a worthless sop if the electors have no voice in the selection of candidates.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator has said about what I was going to say, but I should like to suggest to the Senator that he made a mistake when he referred to those who were in the rut and wanted to stay there. He meant, did he not, those who had the people in a rut and wanted to keep them there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; both. The man who does not want to change the government and never sees an improvement would like to have lived in the days when they cut grain with a sickle; he would oppose the self-binder; he would oppose the threshing machine; he would beat the grain out with a flail or tramp it out with an ox. He would oppose any change in government. Our forefathers when they founded our Government did not claim it was perfect, but they recognized that those who would follow them could improve on their handiwork, because they did not say in that great Constitution, "This document shall never be amended; this is the supreme law and the last word in government"; but they provided for a method by which their children, their descendants, could change it to meet existing conditions. It is no reflection on them to make or advocate the changes necessary to meet the demands of advancing civilization. We can honor them most by blazing the trees in the advancing path of human progress.

Mr. President, the Secretary in his address said:

> I am firmly convinced that when we have attempted to improve the work of our forefathers by amending the Constitution in its basic policy of government we have failed signally.

He believes we never ought to change it. That means, Mr. President, that we would not have the amendment to the Constitution which says that the liberty of the press and the freedom of speech shall always be maintained. That means, if it means anything, that we to-day would have slavery, that we would be buying and selling human beings. That means that the people of the United States would not be allowed to elect men who are to sit as Senators in this Chamber, but must submit the matter to the machine, to somebody else. That means we would have no primary. That means that no change could ever be made to relieve human suffering or to bring about improvement in government. That means that little children of the poor should be compelled to wear away their lives in dark and insanitary factories in order to keep their masters in luxury and political power. In short, that means that we should never improve our Government. Machine control of politics did not exist in our forefathers' days. Manipulation of conventions was then unknown. We are unworthy sons of noble sires if we do not meet new methods of evil by modern methods of political warfare.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I hesitate to presume because of my friendship for the Senator. I know that he would indulge me to almost any extent, as I would him, either in public debate or in private conversation; but does not the Senator really think that the Secretary of War, in the words just quoted, was referring to the eighteenth amendment, which he held to be a violation of a fuundamental principle of our Government, in that he perhaps holds it, as I do, to be not a true amendment to the Constitution, altering the framework of government, but a statute written into the Constitution which marks a departure from certain fundamental principles of our Government?

The Senator is not discussing the question of the primary only——

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I have not been allowed to discuss it; there have been so many interruptions about the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. FRANCE. No; but the Senator is discussing a larger question. He has already referred to the two theories of government—the old theory, under which the Government was the master of the people, and the new American theory, under which the people are supposed to be at all times the masters of the Government. While he is discussing that theory, it seems to me he should give some attention to the problem raised by the Secretary of War in connection with the eighteenth amendment, which, in my judgment, the Secretary believes to be a movement in the direction of making the Government the master of the people, because the Government can be made the master of the people by writing statutes into the Constitution or by transferring from the people to the Government power which can not be readily taken back.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Maryland if he understands that the Secretary of War was denouncing the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. FRANCE. I do not think he was denouncing the eighteenth amendment, but I think he was deploring the fact that in writing the eighteenth amendment—a statute—into the Constitution we had violated a fundamental principle of our Government. I read his speech with much interest and, I thought, with some attention several days ago, and I think he was deploring the fact that in writing the eighteenth amendment, in writing a statute into the Constitution of the United States, and therefore removing from the jurisdiction of the people the matter covered by that statute we had violated a fundamental principle of government by the people—the principle under which the people should at all times be the masters and not the servants of our Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I have not any authority to speak for the Secretary of War, but I doubt very much if the Secretary of War intended to be understood as denouncing the eighteenth amendment; and I think before that construction should be placed on his speech we ought to be able to put our fingers upon the lines which indicate that.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield, I will say that the Senator from Nebraska has just quoted the words of the Secretary of War in which he referred to certain amendments. I am very confident, having had the honor to enjoy the friendship of the Secretary of War, that he was not referring to the fourteenth amendment nor the fifteenth amendment. I think it can be readily ascertained from reading the context of his speech that he was referring quite pointedly to the eighteenth amendment, although he did not mention that amendment specifically.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, why not say he was referring to the nineteenth amendment? He was talking about the right of people to vote, and that was the one that gave the women the right to vote.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to my good friend from Arkansas that it may be that he was referring also to the nineteenth amendment, although I do not think the same principle is involved in the nineteenth amendment that is involved in the eighteenth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, how queer it is that Senators who have some preconceived idea about something—I am not disputing that they may be right, although I do not think they are—will give to the Secretary's words a construction that in my judgment they do not bear. I would not dare do that. His friends may do that. He mentioned the primary by name. If the language that I have quoted refers to the eighteenth amendment, or if the Secretary was thinking about the eighteenth amendment when he used that language, he ought to have said so. I will read it again:

> I am firmly convinced that when we have attempted to improve the work of our forefathers by amending the Constitution in its basic policy of government we have failed signally.

I should say, with the Senator from Arkansas, that instead of that having reference to the eighteenth amendment, it had reference to the amendment giving women the right to vote. That is one of the basic principles.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me talk just a little about the eighteenth amendment now. The Senator from Maryland thinks in terms of the eighteenth amendment all the time. It bothers him. He puts everything on that saddle. He was opposed to it. Unquestionably he was conscientious in his opposition. I did not vote with the Senator, although I have great respect for his judgment and his opinion on governmental questions; but the Senator has gone wild on the eighteenth amendment. When the President says something that could be by any possible construction meant to apply to and bear out the Senator's idea of the eighteenth amendment, he immediately applies it. He does not give it any other application.

The Senator ought not to think so much about the eighteenth amendment. He ought to realize that it is in the Constitution; it is part of our Government, and even if the people have made a mistake, why, great God! it is their own Government. They have a right to make a mistake if they want to. They have the same power yet to rectify it if they think they have made a mistake. I do not think they have made one in that respect. I do not believe they will make the change that the Senator from Maryland thinks they ought to make; but if we are going to continue to have a government, and not have a revolution every time there is a change, then those like the able and patriotic Senator from Maryland ought to submit when, according to the fundamental method laid down by George Washington and his fellows, the Constitution has been amended. It then becomes the law of the land. If the Senator wants to repeal it, that is a different proposition; but that is no reason, it seems to me, to argue that free government in a free country is a failure, and that the people do not know how to govern themselves, and therefore they ought not to be permitted to nominate their officers; they ought to let somebody select them, and say, "We will give you a choice between these two fellows, and we do not care which one you take." That is about the way the convention system operates.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator for yielding to permit me to say that while I do feel that the eighteenth amendment was an alteration in the basic policy——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, can we not change the basic policy, even, if we want to?

Mr. FRANCE. We have changed the basic policy.

Mr. NORRIS. Have we not a right to change the basic policy if we want to?

Mr. FRANCE. We have a right to change it. What I wished to say to the Senator was that I am sure he will acquit me of any lack of loyalty to the Constitution as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, certainly; I do acquit the Senator. I had no intention of insinuating anything else.

Mr. FRANCE. I do accept the decision of the people. Not only that, but I am most earnestly in favor of the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and of the laws written under it until it shall be repealed, as I hope it may be, because I shall always be opposed to any amendment to the Constitution of the United States which diminishes the power of the people over their own affairs. While I know that many of our more liberal statesmen—and the Senator from Nebraska is a conspicuous example of one of the great, liberal statesmen of America—voted for the eighteenth amendment, I believe that in doing so they were voting for a basic change in policy which was not liberal in its nature, because it was not in the direction of doing the very thing for which the Senator is contending to-day; it was not in the direction of enlarging the power of the people over their own affairs.

The vice of the eighteenth amendment can be readily seen by reversing the thing. If, when the country was in the control of legislators who were representing States where liquor was sold, and whose views were that it was proper that liquor should be sold, there had been adopted an amendment to the Constitution making the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors compulsory throughout the Nation and in every State, I ask the Senator if that would have been fair? It would not have been fair, because it would have written into the Constitution a statute which would have prevented the great movement toward temperance. But the same principle is involved. If it is legitimate to write a prohibitive statute of any kind into the Constitution of the United States, it is also a sound principle to write an affirmative, mandatory statute. It is exactly the same principle, and in examining the principle we must seek to ascertain how it would work under every conceivable set of circumstances. I think it would have been a mistake to have written into the Constitution of the United States in the days when it could easily have been done a statute making it mandatory that intoxicating liquors must be manufactured and sold in each and every State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I said before, I did not want to be taken into a discussion of the righteousness or unrighteousness of the eighteenth amendment. It has nothing to do with what I was talking about. I have tried to get away from it three or four times, but the Senator from Maryland insists that I stay with it, and although I did not intend to discuss it, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate to discuss it; it is not before the Senate; it has not any more to do with the question I am discussing than the flowers that bloom in the springtime, yet I am driven into the extremity of discussing it.

The Senator's argument is answered by his own statement. He said: "Suppose our forefathers had inserted a provision in the Constitution that every State should go into the manufacture of intoxicating liquor." Suppose, Mr. President, they had put into the Constitution a statement that every governor of every State should be hanged and that every member of the legislature should be starved to death. You can imagine a million things they may have put in it, but which they did not. We could make fools of ourselves here—sometimes I think we do; but we could do it very easily by passing some fool law. We have the power to do it. We can provide as a penalty for murder imprisonment in the jail for six months or the payment of a 10-cent fine, if we want to. A lot of things might happen; men could do a lot of foolish things. The very fact that we do not do them seems to me evidence that we ought to maintain the primary, which has nominated practically every Senator who sits within the sound of my voice.

Let us see how the Senator's proposition would work. He says, "Suppose they had put into the Constitution a provision compelling everybody to go into the whisky business." Let me read the fourth amendment to the Constitution. Suppose that had not been adopted, but the reverse had been, just as the Senator says the reverse should be done in reference to liquor? The fourth amendment reads as follows:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

Suppose they had said: "The people shall not be secure in persons, no property shall be exempt from search and seizure by any officer."

Amendment No. 1 provides:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Suppose, instead of saying that, they had said: "Congress shall make a law to set up a religion. Congress shall provide by law that there shall be no freedom of the press and no freedom of speech. Congress shall provide by law that none of the people shall have the right to assemble to petition for a redress of grievances." There would be just as much force in that as in the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland. The answer is that people who are sufficiently intelligent to govern themselves are not such fools as to put that kind of provision into a fundamental law.

Let me go back and discuss the speech of Secretary Weeks. I do not know just where I was when I was interrupted, but one of the statements made by Secretary Weeks is that the primary has a tendency to abolish partisanship in government, to do away with party responsibility. If that were the only thing it ever did, it would justify its existence. If there is any one evil in government to-day, it is the evil of arbitrary partisanship, which leaves Senators to come into the Senate saying, "What is my vote? Where does the committee stand? I do not know a thing about what has been discussed, but I am going to vote for a tariff a mile high if the committee has it in the bill that way." If the committee goes out and changes it and comes in with a lower rate, they will be with the committee again. Partisanship has been responsible for more evil in government than any other one thing.

If you will read the Farewell Address of George Washington, you will find that in the great address he called the attention of the country to the evil of partisanship and said that while parties are necessary, where partisanship went too far, and biased a man's judgment and curbed his conscience, it was like a fire, which, while it was good to warm by, yet if it got beyond control, it would destroy everything good in the vicinity.

So, I answer, if the primary will do away with some of the partisanship by which men blindly follow the boss, by which people vote arbitrarily as they are told, then God hasten the day when the primary may control every election, from that of President down to the choice of road supervisor. A great deal could be said about that and along that line showing its evil, but I do not care to go into it any further.

The Secretary said, in that speech, in substance, that the legislative branch of the National Government was down to the lowest ebb in history. I am inclined to agree with him in that statement, and there is just one thing that can be cited as the reason why it is down there—partisanship. He said the people did not have confidence in Congress. I do not believe they have. A good many times I do not see how they possibly can have confidence in Congress, and Congress is to blame for it. Recently in the other branch of the National Legislature Congressmen WOODRUFF and JOHNSON of South Dakota introduced a resolution of investigation, which was ordered reported out of the Rules Committee; but at the command of partisan leaders—at the command of self-appointed leaders who control arbitrarily the destiny and the action of the Republican Party in the House—a halt was called, the chairman of the Rules Committee was made to face about; he was compelled to hold the resolution in his pocket, and ultimately to take it back, and when a roll call was had we find that the power of party, rank partisanship, the power of the leaders, the self-appointed leaders, mostly outside of the House itself, was sufficient to control the conscience and the votes of that great body of men.

We exhibit before the American people, in my judgment, a disgraceful condition, when at the command of our party leader we refuse to let the sun shine in on rottenness, if there is any rottenness; when we refuse to permit an investigation. That is not free government. That is boss control; that is machine rule. That is rule by partisanship. Let the primary come even to the White House if it will relieve that disgraceful condition.

We are told now in the papers that Congress is commanded by the Executive, "You must pass a ship subsidy bill." Who is our master who thus commands? Who is the boss of the Congress? Are we going to submit? Do we want to do it? We do not want to, but are we going to? All the papers announce that arrangements are being made to coerce Congressmen and get them into line to obey that mandate. That is partisanship. The Secretary wants to banish the primary because he says it will interfere with this partisanship control.

Congress is to blame if it does not have a good standing with the people. If it asserted its authority, if it performed its constitutional functions without dictation from anybody, it would not occupy that position in the minds of the American people.

During the Wilson administration we on this side used to hurl epithets at you over on the other side. We said that the Democratic Party of the House and the Senate was nothing but a rubber stamp, was moved around by the power in the White House at his will. I said it many times, and believed it, and I think yet it was true. But the rubber stamp is over here now, it seems. There is a different boss. The people did not get relief; they only changed bosses, and the same instrumentalities and the same methods are being used now as before. No wonder the Congress is not in good standing before the people of America. A Republican rubber stamp is just as bad as a Democratic rubber stamp.

Coming directly back to the primary——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to direct a question to the Senator before he resumes the line of his argument. I think the Senator was right in the view that the Secretary did not have specifically in mind the eighteenth amendment when he condemned the recent amendments to the Constitution. I would like to ask the Senator which particular amendment or amendments he conceives the Secretary did have in mind. The sixteenth amendment authorizes the imposition of income taxes. The seventeenth amendment provides for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. The eighteenth amendment is the prohibition amendment, and the nineteenth amendment is the woman suffrage amendment. Which one of those, or which ones of those, does the Senator from Nebraska conceive the Secretary so vigorously condemned?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator is asking me only for an opinion, and I am going to give it, but I want it understood that it is only my opinion. I have no knowledge which would give me any idea as to whether the Secretary was thinking of any particular amendment. I assume from his language that he was thinking of all of them, because his language would indicate that. He said:

> I am firmly convinced that when we have attempted to improve the work of our forefathers by amending the Constitution in its basic policy of government we have failed signally.

Every one of the amendments the Senator suggests is basic, goes to the basic principle of government. I think he had reference to all of them.

I think we ought all to be fair and judge other people just as we would be judged, and I know from my experience in life that human beings are all more or less unconsciously biased and prejudiced. I think that is true of all of us. I am not claiming to be an exception to the rule. We judge these things by the way they have affected us. It is possible, taking that view of it, that I am very much in favor of the primary, because I know that if it had not been for the primary I would not be here and never would have been here. I realize that fully, and I therefore, even though I am unconscious of being prejudiced—and if I am prejudiced I am unconscious of it—I would be inclined perhaps to be biased without knowing it in favor of the primary, although, perhaps, I should not say that the primary is a good thing because it sent me here. That may be a good argument against it. But at least that would have a tendency to show why I favor the primary. Secretary Weeks and President Harding may be opposed to the primary for the same reason, opposed in reality to the people selecting their officials, opposed to the amendment to the Constitution which gave the people the right to elect their own Senators. Secretary Weeks was elected to this body by the Legislature of Massachusetts. While he was here the Constitution was changed, and the first time the people of his State got a chance to vote in his case when he ran for reelection they defeated him. For the same reason that I may be unconsciously prejudiced in favor of giving the people power to select their officials it is possible that he, unconsciously of course, may be prejudiced and biased in the other direction.

President Harding, when he was running for President, never got to first base wherever there was a presidential primary. I remember in the great State of Indiana, where they had a presidential primary, practically all of the candidates were in that State in person making a canvass. There was Senator JOHNSON, there was General Wood, there was Governor Lowden, and there was Senator Harding, all of them in the State in person, and everybody else they could get to go there to advocate their cause. They had a primary there. The result was a very close vote between Senator JOHNSON and General Wood. It took a good while to know who was ahead, and there is some doubt yet as to which one of those men was ahead. Governor Lowden was a very good third, but nobody thought about Senator Harding unless the newspapers announced that he also ran. So, without knowing it, and unconsciously, the President may be prejudiced against the primary for the same reason that I am prejudiced for it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I also remember that Mr. Harding came very near being an "also ran" in Ohio when the presidential primary was held there. But what I rose to say was this. I notice that the Secretary of War, when the question was being submitted to the House as to whether Senators should be elected by a direct vote, was so undecided about whether the people had wisdom enough to do it that he voted "present," and would not vote either yea or nay when he was a Member of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Who voted?

Mr. CARAWAY. Secretary Weeks voted "present."

Mr. NORRIS. On what question?

Mr. CARAWAY. When the question was submitted to determine whether or not Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may find on looking up the RECORD that he was paired.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have looked that up. He was not paired.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to repeat that I have not anything personal, and I have not any feeling against the people who are opposing the primary, and I concede again that I may be blind about it. But I believe that the principle of the primary is fundamental. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the primary in the United States can be abolished unless some other method, by which the people are given the right to name their candidates, can be put in its place and this Government stand as a free Government.

This attack on the ballot in the primary is a step toward monarchy. The primary is of more importance in most cases than the election. It is just as fundamental. The man who does not know enough to vote intelligently at the primary does not know enough to vote intelligently at the election. If we want to retain the right to vote, then we must retain that right in all of its power. We must retain that right completely. We have not retained it if we let the bosses do our nominating while we do the selecting between the candidates whom they put up for us.

The time is coming when it is going to be an issue and we must fight it out. We can not remain quiet about it. I felt that I could not remain longer silent on the subject. I believe with the poet that—

> To sin by silence when we should protest
> Makes cowards out of men—and that the world has climbed in protest and the world never would have climbed an inch if somebody had not pointed to something that was wrong in the governmental fabric. The few who dare must speak and speak again to right the wrongs of the many.

The abolishment of the primary means a step backwards. It is not perfect, I know. Instead of abolishing it we ought to devote our minds and our intellects and our powers toward improvement. We believe, I take it, that the people of the United States are sufficiently intelligent to vote, and there is no reason why we should say they may vote at one election and not at another. There is no reason why we should say, "You will have nothing whatever to say about the selection of your candidates, even though we give you the right to choose after we have selected them."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. One of the most inveterate criticisms leveled at the direct primary is the alleged high expense connected with the primary. I direct attention to the fact that Colonel Brookhart in the recent primary in Iowa secured the nomination by an expenditure of less than $500. I am sure we all agree that under the convention system he never would have secured the nomination under any circumstances. Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. NORRIS. Undoubtedly. There is no question about it. Of course, again we come to the selfish thing in our natures. In the Iowa contest I was very much interested, and while I was not able to take any part, and did not do so, I was extremely anxious that Mr. Brookhart should win. He gained my sympathy because of the unfair methods that were used to defeat him where the machine had gotten out all kinds of candidates to try to divide the vote. I have been told by men from Iowa, who know the conditions in the State, that, assuming that Mr. Brookhart would not get 35 per cent of the votes and hence the primary nomination be naught, they had already all the arrangements made to nominate, and had chosen the person they should nominate, in the State convention. I do not know that that is true. I have been told that by Iowa men who ought to know. It was assumed that they had enough men in the field so that nobody would be nominated, and then they proceeded to fix the convention, and they said they had that all fixed. I think the victory of Mr. Brookhart was an exceedingly great one for progressive free government.

Mr. ASHURST. It seems to me, if the Senator will yield further, that at least that one objection to the primary system ought to be silenced when it is recalled that Iowa is a populous State. Iowa has 99 counties. If a candidate may canvass that State and secure the nomination with the expenditure of less than $500, I fail to see the force of the objection that a primary is too expensive.

Mr. NORRIS. To my mind the idea that it takes a fortune to be elected to office is preposterous. I have been nominated for the Senate twice by primaries and neither time did I spend as much as $500 for a nomination. The result in Iowa demonstrates that if a man represents the people, if he is true to what he claims to be, and convinces them of it, it does not take much money to accomplish the result. A great many times too much money is spent. It is one of the evils we should rectify. I think we have had, in the incident to which the Senator has called attention in Iowa, a demonstration that it is not necessary to spend a fortune in order to get a nomination at a primary. We should, however, prevent by law the expending of large sums of money for office. The violation of the law should disbar the candidate from holding the office.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have been very much interested, as I am sure most Senators have been, in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The attack of the Secretary of War on the primary system is a very grave and serious one. The Washington Post of this morning, in one of its editorials, said:

The fact that he—

Meaning the Secretary of War—

was himself inclined to entitle his address, "The Decline of the American Government," shows how serious is the view which he takes of the situation.

Mr. President, the author of the American Declaration of Independence said, "I believe in the rule of the people." Abraham Lincoln, later a President of the United States, said the same thing. Jackson said, "By the Eternal, the people shall rule." We see an effort now being made to remove the Government as far as possible from the people, to take away from them the right to select their representatives in this American representative form of government.

Mr. President, the Bible tells us that when the lowly Nazarene was upon the earth the common people heard Him gladly. When He got ready to select His disciples, He did not select them from the highbrows nor from the mighty rich. He selected them from the masses, the common people, the people of heart, conscience, and convictions.

The danger that existed in every government in the past, many of them lying stranded on the shores of time, was the centralization of power, the taking away from the people of the power that they should have and exercise, and lodging it in the hands of the favored few. We are told by the statesmen of the past that we should profit by the mistakes and failures of other governments, that we should avoid the dangers and pitfalls that line the path of the nations that have gone down into the long night of time.

Is it any wonder, Mr. President, that the Secretary of War, a member of President Harding's Cabinet, should speak of the decline of the American Government when the Congress which they control deliberately took the taxes off of the profiteers of the country, who stayed at home, 3,000 miles from the battle front in France, far removed from danger, clipping coupons and amassing great fortunes, and then came forward with a tariff tax bill to tax even the salt that goes into the bread of every man, woman, and child in America? The tariff bill taxes the common necessities of life from the cradle to the grave.

Now, when a Government in the hands of the Republicans will take the tax off of those most able to pay taxes and put the tax on those least able to pay them, is it any wonder that the Secretary of War should speak of the decline of the American Government as we knew it in its pristine power and glory? It was never intended that this Government should be manipulated and operated in the interests of a favored few. Jefferson laid down the doctrine upon which this Government must stand if it is to live—equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Yet here we are with one of the mouthpieces of the administration in the Cabinet demanding that the primary shall be abandoned and the people be removed from participation in the selection of the candidates of the two great parties, which must fight out their battle at the polls in the general election.

What does that mean, Mr. President? Does it mean that our Republican friends find that the primaries are too costly? Does it mean that our opportunity to expose corruption in a primary is greater than in the case of a convention? That is true, whether it means that or not. You can not get on to the scheming and the corrupt practices employed to bring about a nomination in a convention as surely as you can in a primary. The primary is stretched out over weeks and months, and there is an opportunity day after day to watch the conduct of the candidates and their friends, and one may find out whether or not they are spending money and trying to buy the nomination; but it is not so with a convention. No. Men at a convention may meet and hold their private councils in the wild noon of night, when everybody is asleep but a few. Then they can do the crooked work and spend money where it will do the most good, and nobody will ever be wiser. You discover the wrong done when it is too late to remedy it. Does this attack on the primary system mean that those who profit tremendously by legislation are wanting to simplify the machinery by which they select the Members of the other branch and this branch of Congress? Is that what they are driving at? Does it cost more to control a primary than it does to control a few in a convention? What is it that is back of this drive from the White House down through the members of the Cabinet to do away with the primary and popular government in parties? That is what they are seeking to destroy, to take this power away from the people and give it to a favored few for their control and manipulation.

Mr. President, we have long boasted that our Government was the greatest form of government in all the world, because it sought to do that which would bring about the greatest good to the greatest number. We have been told that that policy is the wisest and the best which seeks to bring about the greatest good to the greatest number; but here we are confronted with a different suggestion. Millions of men and women of America have been educated and trained and we have been telling them to inform themselves about public affairs, to acquaint themselves with the problems of government, so that they may know how best to exercise the ballot in the selection of those who are to serve them in the lawmaking bodies and other positions in the Government. We have long talked about the necessity for educating the masses. Jefferson once said that when everyone could read the country would be safe in their hands.

Now, in our primaries the voter reads and hears public questions discussed and informs himself or herself upon the merits of the various candidates, and he or she is entitled to have a voice in the matter of selecting the candidate to be presented as the party's standard bearer in the general election. Who can object to that?

Mr. President, I do not look with so much fear upon the attacks upon the primary system, because the American people are not going to abandon that system. They will, however, abandon those who seek to abandon the system. That is what will happen. Can it be that the results in Pennsylvania were not satisfactory to the Republican Party? The nomination of Mr. Pinchot, we are told, was a triumph over the machine in that State. Can it be that that had anything to do with the fact that some in authority are not satisfied? It is true that in Indiana the President's friend, the able and clever Senator from that State [Mr. NEW], was defeated in a primary, and out in Iowa Mr. Brookhart ran away with the situation, though it is said that the Republican bosses had selected five or six candidates from different parts of the State to divide up the vote so that no candidate might get a plurality, or 35 per cent of the vote, and the nomination could be thrown into a convention, where a man who had never been a candidate in the primary could be nominated. What do Senators think of that? What was it enabled the people to prevent that situation? It was the primary system. O, Mr. President, it is little by little and bit by bit.

If we abandon the primary system it will not be long until these highbrows and purse-proud plutocrats will be saying that we ought to abolish trial by jury, that 1 man should try a case instead of 12, thus taking away from the common man his right to appeal for a jury trial and lodging the power in the hands of one person.

I recall, Mr. President, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] addressed the Republican National Convention at Chicago he said that the Republican Party proposed to do away with the last vestige of the Wilson administration. Well, the Democrats put a tax on the profiteers of America. That was the first time in history that the mighty rich were compelled by the powers that be to pay their share of the taxes. We made them pay it; we levied taxes against them and collected them. What did they do? In 1918 they contributed large sums of money to the defeat of the Democratic Party, and they used that money to corrupt politics and give you control of the House and the Senate, and you bought a seat in Michigan outright. That is what they did in 1918. Why? Because the Democrats had dared to use their power in order to make the mighty rich do what was right and just, and they resented it. You promised to take that tax off. The mighty rich opposed and punished us for putting the tax on them and helped to elect you, and you took it off.

The Bible says, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Go look at the record. We taxed them into the millions; you took the taxes off. They fought us at the polls; they spent money to help to elect you and to help to defeat us. Is that any reason why we should quit fighting for the right, because these purse-proud fellows were triumphant in an election? We must fight on and on and on until the people know the true situation here. Then they will speak for themselves, as they should, at the polls a little later on.

Our political adversaries were going to wipe out the last vestige of the Wilson administration. Well, that is one of the acts of the Wilson administration which they wiped out. Christ himself demanded more of the man with five talents than he did of the man with two talents. That is what we were doing. We were making the man with millions pay more than the man with a few thousands, but you came in and reversed that policy, and now you have taken the tax off of the man with five talents and you have put it on the man with two. That is what you are doing.

I hold in my hand here now, Mr. President, a communication sent to me by Mrs. J. S. Starke, of Troy, Ala., State chairman Home Economics, Alabama Federation of Women's Clubs, in which she says:

Will you please read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following resolution?

The resolution reads:

Resolved, That we protest against the food, tableware, and women's-wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill. These schedules will increase the cost of living in every American home. They are fines levied by American men upon American women and upon American children. They should not be allowed to become law.

These fellows who are so haughty and proud that they do not care to bother with the primary want to remove the Government and all party machinery as far as possible from the mass of people out yonder, and they want to take the hand of taxation entirely off the fat purses of the rich. You have done that—and where did you put it? You put it upon the common necessities of life. Here is an American mother representing hundreds of other American mothers sending a protest to this body, telling you that you are levying taxes upon the common necessities of life, and that you are going to increase the cost of living in every home in America.

Do you know what the assaults on the primary system indicate? They indicate that you realize what you are doing and you do not want the people coming out from various American homes to have a say in expressing their individual choice at the polls in the primary, because if they do they are going to demand of their candidate, "Are you for us and justice and right, or are you for the greed and avarice of the other crowd?" That is the reason, Mr. President, many of these people do not want the primary system; that is the reason they want to do away with it.

We put upon the statute books the income tax law which makes the mighty rich pay taxes. They used to escape entirely, but we Democrats advocated the income tax law until we brought it about, and we now derive millions of dollars from that source.

I would not apply the income-tax principle to the man of small or moderate means. I mean the man whose income is small or moderate.

If the primary is to be abolished, you will finally abolish the income tax, just as you took the tax off of the profiteer; you will take the income tax off of those most able to bear the burdens of government.

Mr. President, "the decline of the American Government" is discussed by the Secretary of War. Is it any wonder? Here we are confronted with the proposition of passing a ship subsidy bill. When Woodrow Wilson went out of the White House, it was the boast of American citizens that we had the greatest merchant fleet in the world except that of Great Britain; and what happened to it? You have a man at the head of the Shipping Board who came in saying that these ships were no good. What do you think of a man who is going to try to dispose of some of your goods telling the fellow he wants to sell them to that the stuff is worthless and asking him then what he will give for it? Here is what a great many people say happened: That these ships were bargained to the Ship Trust—they cost $800,000 each, some of them $600,000—and that this board proposed to sell them to the Ship Trust for $2,100 each. Think of that, Senators! We made such a protest against it that the bargain has been held up temporarily, and now we understand that the Ship Trust tells us: "We are not going to operate these ships unless you practically give them to us, and we are not going to operate them then unless you pay us to run them. You have got to go out and tax the American people millions of dollars every year and pay that money to us to operate the ships that you have given to us for a song."

A government that will do that is liable to cause some people to think that it is in bad hands; but, Mr. President, we will not despair of the Republic so long as against the ills of evil we hold the remedy of right. The American people are waking up. The mutterings in Pennsylvania indicate it. The roarings of political thunder in Iowa and Indiana indicate it.

Various other signs of the times point to a change in affairs at the Capitol, point to a Democratic House at the other end of the Capitol, and a greatly reduced number of Republican Senators at this end of the Capitol. Those in power are bemoaning the fact that the people are waking up and participating in the affairs of government. They resent it. They are indignant at it. Whose Government is this? It is the Government of the people of the United States. Who should take an interest in it? The citizen. What was the Government established for? For the welfare of the citizen. That is the whole end and aim of constitutional government. Here we are told that we must eliminate millions from participation in party primaries so that a favored few, with their millions, can dominate the conventions of both parties. In that case they could never lose.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the primary plan. I helped to bring it about in my State. Talk about a Republic surviving, perpetuating a great Government like this, and then wanting to take away from the people the right to select the candidates of their party! It is utterly ridiculous; but all of this tends to show the American people the direction in which we are drifting under Republican rule—

A duped people, hourly doomed to pay
The price that bribes their liberties away.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, it seems that we are having more or less of a field day, and I want to join in the protest against any effort to repeal the primary law in any of the States where such system exists. The matter has been at times more or less of a live issue in my part of the country, and my observation has been as a rule that the people who object to the primary system are the people who are unable to succeed in a primary. They want a "representative government" that is directed and controlled and dominated by officers that are not selected by those that they are to represent; that is, if they are to represent the entire public.

I have always felt that, as far as corruption and contamination influence is concerned, it is a great deal easier to contaminate and corrupt a convention of a few delegates than it is to corrupt the entire people. The man who goes out to buy the great populace and the sovereign voters of the country has a much greater undertaking upon his hands than if he undertakes to manipulate a convention. In fact, if the issue is well defined the voters will repudiate the corrupt and excessive use of money in an election. I believe that if we should revert to the convention system in this country and abolish the primary, the trend of governmental affairs would be to drift further and further away from giving the people their just rights and fair consideration in all branches of Government.

Take our judiciary: Under the old system, where the voice of the people had but little influence upon the legislative branch of our Government, as well as all other branches of the Government, too often there was discrimination in favor of the special interest. Under the old system, largely, our courts adjudicated cases upon technicalities. Errors that did not affect or reach the merits of the case in any way whatever would frequently be the determining point in litigation. The will of the American people and the protest against such system eventually brought about a more just and a more reasonable policy, and brought about express legislation in many of the States to the effect that cases should not be disposed of upon errors that did not affect the merits of the case.

I recall the time when a case would be appealed, and error would be assigned, and probably one assignment of error would be a question of constitutional grounds. The appellate court would not pass upon the constitutional question at all, but would pass upon some purely technical question that did not reach the merits of the case, did not reach the question of whether or not the law was constitutional, and reverse the case, as I say, upon such purely technical ground. The result was, of course, great delay and postponement of litigation, and in many cases the infliction of an injustice upon litigants.

That was a condition that grew up in this country largely under the old convention system, where the people had very little to say about who should represent them in legislative bodies, in administrative office, and in the judiciary; but with the trend of the last two decades toward a more popular form of government, we have enacted remedial legislation affecting court deliberations, and a great deal has been accomplished that, in my opinion, never would have been accomplished under the former régime.

Take the question of the income-tax constitutional amendment. I dare say that if it had not been that the people had a greater opportunity than formerly to express their will at the ballot box we never would have had enacted in this country the income tax law or the constitutional provision authorizing it. The popular election of Untied States Senators, instead of the old system of the often corrupted legislature electing United States Senators, and many laws which are proving to the benefit of the American people have come about very largely from the fact that the people have had a greater voice than in former years in the selection of their officers. I would far rather trust the people to elect their public officials at the ballot box than to trust any convention to name our officials.

I deplore any effort looking to a repeal of the primary system or any effort that looks to taking from the people the right to express their will in regard to their public officers at the polls, and it will be a sad day for this country if we should return entirely to the old convention system.

Of course, the primary system may have some defects. One of the great troubles is that of some people trying to buy their way into office through the primary system; but under the old convention system that practice was followed and was followed more successfully than under the primary. I recall, just about the time I reached my young manhood, that the primary system came into operation in my State, and the old convention system disappeared. At that convention, the only one that was held in my State after I became a voter, the contest was on, not between the people of that State as to whom they should select fot their public officers but largely between the railroad interests of the State. A certain system had its candidate that it was trying to foist upon the people of the State for the purpose of trying to manipulate things in its own special interest. Another railroad, having some conflicting interest, had its candidate that it was trying to impose upon the people of that State; and as far as the great mass of the voters were concerned, they had but little chance in that convention. Of course, one of the railroads succeeded; the people did not succeed; and they did not get representation in government under that convention which selected railroad candidates for office whenever there was a conflict between the interests of the people and the railroad interests.

While now and then some one rises and says, "We want a convention system instead of the primary system," regardless of the evils which are more or less connected with a primary system, those evils are quadrupled in a convention system, and government is removed further from the people. As a rule, only the particular interest that controls and dominates conventions is represented where a convention system is in vogue; and as for my part, I desire to utter my protest against any revival of the old, corrupt debauchery of a convention system as against a primary system.

Let us try to perfect the primary system. Let us pass rigid laws to prohibit corrupt expenditures and to prohibit the expenditure of excessive sums in trying to obtain a nomination in a primary, and devote more energy to that, instead of trying to bring back the old convention system, which is pretty generally known throughout the country to have been manipulated time and time again against the interests of the American people.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to House bill 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives to amendment numbered 1 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator advise me as to what the disagreement relates?

Mr. PHIPPS. It relates to the amendments affecting the fiscal system of the District of Columbia which were adopted on the floor of the Senate day before yesterday.

I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to House bill 10101, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the consideration of the pending bill yesterday evening the Senate adopted an amendment to strike out a certain provision in lines 1 and 2, page 34. By inadvertence certain language on page 33 connected with that amendment is left in the bill. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on line 20, page 33, inserting the words "and allowances," was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the words "and allowances" were inserted after the word "pay" on line 20, page 33? the Chair hears no objection, and it is reconsidered. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that it may be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make a similar request, for the same reason, as to the word "pay," in line 24, page 33.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was adopted? The Chair hears none, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

REMOVALS FROM AND APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I hope I shall not delay the consideration of the naval appropriation bill more than a few moments.

I rise to call attention to a publication appearing in the Washington Post of this morning, the leading article, written by Mr. Price, a newspaper writer who speaks with authority for this administration. It is an article published in the administration's chief defense, and therefore I know it is authentic. It deals with a desire entertained by a great number of Republican Congressmen to have patronage. It says that a petition signed by 150 Republican Members of the House is to-day to be presented to the President, demanding that about 150 employees in the Treasury Department shall be displaced because they are Democrats and that Republicans be given their places.

It is true that by insinuation it is charged that these Democrats are disloyal; that they report to certain former officials of the Wilson administration. What they should have to report is not revealed. Why they should report to former Wilson administration officials is not disclosed, but the fact is their jobs are wanted, and wanted for political reasons. Three or four paragraphs of this article I shall read in addition to the headlines. I shall read first from the headlines, because almost the whole story is told in them. I read:

REPUBLICANS SEEK POSTS IN TREASURY FOR PARTY MEN; PLEA TO HARDING—PETITION SIGNED BY OVER 150 MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WILL BE PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT URGING REMOVAL OF FORMER ADMINISTRATION APPOINTEES—LIST JOBS THAT ARE WANTED—CHARGES MADE THAT HOLDOVERS IN KEY POSITIONS ARE NOT SERVING IN THE BEST INTEREST OF THE COUNTRY—ADD THAT REPUBLICAN ORGANIZATION HAS SUFFERED AND UNFRIENDLY INTERESTS HAVE RECEIVED ADVANTAGES—OTHER ALLEGATIONS ARE MADE.

[By Harry N. Price.]

(Copyright, 1922, by the Washington Post.)

President Harding to-day will be called upon again to give consideration to the long-drawn-out controversy between Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Elmer Dover and Commissioner of Internal Revenue David H. Blair. A petition signed by more than 150 Republican Members of Congress will be presented to the President urging him to uphold the policies inaugurated by Mr. Dover.

ATTITUDE OF REPUBLICANS.

Whether it be true or not, many Republicans in Congress earnestly believe that the best interests of the country will be served by intrusting Republicans with the important key positions in the Treasury Department, and they have been insisting that only Republicans be placed on guard there. It has been charged by this element of the Republicans that Democrats prominently identified with the Wilson administration are still retained in places of such high authority that not only the Republican organization has suffered but that large advantages have been given to private interests not friendly to the administration.

CONCERNED IN THEIR CONTESTS.

Republican Members of the House particularly are deeply concerned with the contest between Dover and Blair. There has been little political patronage thrown the way of the Members who represent the party in power, it is charged by the more rabid Republican plum hunters. These patronage-hungry Members assert Dover has tried to help them in their districts, and at the same time to promote economy and efficiency in the internal revenue and customs services. These Republicans claim that they have not had the support of administration officials, and they have determined, it is said, that there must be a decision by Secretary Mellon whether Democrats shall remain in control or Republicans be placed in charge.

REVOLVES AROUND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER.

What may result if the alleged old Democratic machine continues to dominate the Treasury Department, the Republicans do not say, but there was strong intimation yesterday, as there has been for some time, that there will be a revolt, and perhaps an open break between the "Hill" and the White House.

The controversy between the two Treasury officials has revolved around one of the deputy commissioners of internal revenue, whose Democratic affiliations, it is claimed, are well known. Others who occupy important positions in the Treasury Department, with salaries ranging up to $6,000 a year, are said to be Democrats, and most of them, it is alleged, report regularly to men who were prominent in the Wilson administration.

OVER HUNDRED OFFICIALS ON LIST.

A list of more than 100 officials of the Treasury Department said to be Democrats holding key positions was sent to every Republican Member of the Senate and House yesterday. This list appears to have aroused the wrath of that element of the Republican membership that demands Republicans in all important posts.

Many of the Republicans in Congress frankly admit that they do not expect to be reelected, and they declare that if in the approaching election the party is defeated, and a Democratic Congress returned, there will be little chance for victory in 1924.

Everyone has known of the differences which have existed in the Treasury Department between the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, who wanted to give intelligent service, and the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Dover, who was placed in the department to give out patronage. The Washington Post speaks with inspiration, because if the President has not determined to act upon this matter when he reads the headlines in the Post he will know it is his duty to do so. As I have called to the attention of the Senate before, if it happens that the Post moves in advance of the administration, the administration at once hurries to get in line with the Post. As long as the present administration is in power, and the present policy of the Post continues, there will never be any division in sentiment between these two.

When the President, to satisfy the hungry job hunters, removed a number of men and women from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in such a way as to leave them under a cloud and denied them the right to make an honest living, the Post and others who were the apologists for the President, intimated that there were great irregularities in the bureau and that great scandals were to grow out of an investigation which was to be had in the bureau. One Republican Senator took me out in the cloakroom and told me, when I criticized the President for his unkind act, that I was treading on a powder mine; that literally hundreds of millions of dollars of duplications in bonds had been discovered; and that in just a few days the President was going to release the information as to that, and that I would be destroyed, along with other credulous people who thought that honest people should not be disgraced. That Senator believed it; he had been told it. Of course, those with information about it knew he was mistaken. Everybody knew that the President, when he removed those people in such a spectacular manner, was simply serving notice on the faithful that the President was wielding the ax; that good jobs were to be open for those who were sufficiently indorsed by the organization.

It made no difference to the President that men who had toiled for a lifetime and built up honorable reputations were destroyed. It made no difference to him that women who had gone into the bureau as girls and had labored there faithfully until their hair was as white as snow were disgraced. It made no difference to the organization if those men and women were discharged, their reputations blackened, and their opportunity to earn an honest living taken from them. The "faithful" had to have the jobs, and the "faithful" got them. So this one man was promoted to the place of a man who was dismissed from the service in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the day he got his "promotion," and with a full knowledge of the facts known to the President, because it was a court proceeding, his wife procured a decree against him for the most revolting offenses which could be charged against a man. I have his letter here, a court record, showing that this man not only had debauched a 15-year old girl, but that he was trying to arrange to have a criminal operation performed upon her. There is his letter. It is a court exhibit. It was a matter of public information, and yet an honest man was kicked out of office to reward this man.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, who is that man?

Mr. CARAWAY. He is the man who is now custodian of rolls, dies, and plates in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. KING. Is he the one President Harding appointed after removing the faithful employee?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; he took the place of Mr. Ashburn. Here is his letter, which his wife filed, addressed to a little girl, his "Dear Kid," and advising her to meet him on the avenue, and he would arrange with some doctor to commit a criminal operation on her. She was then 15 years old. In this letter he said that if she would meet him on the avenue, he would give her money, evidently to finance this operation.

It is a public scandal. It is an infamous outrage.

But I am not criticizing the President overmuch. He was hard ridden by the people who wanted places, and Mr. Mellon might just as well realize now as to know it to-morrow or the next day that he, too, has to go. His days in the Treasury Department are numbered. His tenure is brief, indeed, because his ideas are so diametrically opposed to those of Elmer Dover, trained up under the old school of Mark Hanna, the man who invented the "blocks of five."

It is now known to every one that Elmer Dover and the Secretary of the Treasury are engaged in a life and death struggle, one wanting jobs, the other wanting to administer his office so that some public service could be rendered. Between the two the President has already surrendered to Dover, and Mellon will go. I am sure of that for this reason: The Post will not publish a political article which does not reflect the President's attitude, if the President is involved in the controversy. I know, when this article appeared in the Post, with these headlines, showing the necessity of giving these jobs, that the President has surrendered. Mr. Mellon may not yet have been informed, but he will soon be engaged in his private occupation, because Elmer Dover is going to drive him out, together with every efficient man in the Treasury, unless that man can show that he has contributed and will continue to contribute to the Republican campaign fund.

I do not know Mr. Dover, but everybody who does know him bears testimony to one fact, that he went into the Treasury, not to promote efficiency, not because he could lend anything to efficient service in that department, but to spy out the good jobs and call attention to them and have Republicans put in them.

The desire for patronage has swept away every pretense of civil service and every guard that was put around employment in the public service. A Republican postmaster is being removed in my old congressional district right now. There is no contention that he is not a good man, for he is; but he had a clerk who was off on sick leave and he advanced him $25 of his salary to carry him through his illness. A post-office inspector discovered it, and it was such a heinous, outrageous offense that the Postmaster General is now demanding his resignation, with the statement that if he does not resign within a certain number of days he will be removed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think the Senator from Arkansas need be surprised at that kind of conduct in the Post Office Department.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I am not surprised.

Mr. POMERENE. Ever since the inauguration there has been a deliberate attempt to remove every Democrat in the service.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course; they have got to go.

Mr. POMERENE. It applies not only to heads of departments, but to small postmasters out in the country. If the Senator will permit me, I would like to introduce an incident which was furnished me the other day. A Republican postmaster was appointed at West Alexandria, a small village in Preble County, Ohio, near the Indiana line. He had not been in office very long until he addressed a letter to the Democratic village carrier. I have a copy of the letter here, and if the Senator will permit me, I would like to read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall be very glad if the Senator will read it.

Mr. POMERENE. The letter is dated West Alexandria, Ohio, May 26, 1922, and reads as follows:

Mr. T. J. STEWART,
Village Carrier, City.

DEAR SIR: You were no doubt aware at the time of your appointment to the position of village carrier that your tenure of office was only during the length of the administration then holding. In view of this and the fact that that administration has passed, and it is desired that the present administration, as near as possible, be represented in its full extent, it becomes my duty to ask that I have your resignation, same to become effective at the close of business May 31, 1922.

Yours truly,

JOHN M. SWENEY, Postmaster.

There was no charge of inefficiency, no charge of misconduct, except the heinous offense of being a Democrat.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; he held a key position.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; that is probably true.

Mr. KING. A rural carrier?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; a village delivery clerk; but that is one of the "key" positions.

Mr. President, the thing against which I am protesting is the hypocrisy and the demoralization that must follow this course of conduct. If, as the Republican Congressmen say, they have not any hope of reelection unless they can get enough patronage to buy their jobs back, and the administration wants to commit itself to that policy, let them say there have to be places enough to appoint all the disgruntled Republicans to office—and that will be practically the entire membership of the party—and try thus to control the election.

Mr. President, I know the President is going to remove these people, because the Washington Post so plainly intimates it, and the Post knows. If the President had not decided to do it, he will know when he reads it in the Post that it is his duty so to do, and I think that, having found out what is expected of him, he will act accordingly.

But in so doing he must know that it is a confession that the administration has so failed the people that it can not be returned to power upon its record; that it is repudiated by the upright, patriotic citizenship of the country; but it still cherishes the hope that by throwing jobs to the crowd it may change public sentiment sufficiently to stave off defeat. Whenever it discharges the men and women here listed and turns their places over to incompetent men and women—because no man or woman can step into those places without training and render efficient service—it is an admission that it has failed to render service, and it is trying to prolong its political life by distributing patronage, bribing the voters by giving places to people.

I introduced a resolution to ascertain from the President the reason for his removal of certain employees in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. I especially wanted to know why he should have removed former service men whose places were protected by statute. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who is chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, smothered these resolutions in his committee. Two of them were brought out with adverse reports, but the Senate was not permitted to vote upon either of them by reason of objection. They are now lying among those that are dead. The most important of these resolutions asked of the President was why he discharged former soldiers. That resolution is still in the committee. The Senator from South Dakota, with a good deal of heat, told me when I first discussed it that if I would possess my soul in patience the committee would act. I did not think then it would, and it has not. I believed then, as I believe now, that the Senator from South Dakota, however well meaning he may have been, would not be permitted to do it, whether I possessed my soul in patience or not.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I suggest another thought to the Senator?

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POMERENE. The committee which has been investigating this subject has been receiving statements from the Civil Service Commission. Looking at them from the legal standpoint they are marvels of pleas in confession and avoidance. They send clerks or inspectors out to a city or town in my State or to a city or town in the State of Arkansas. Those inspectors come back with reports. The Senate committee are never going to get the facts until they call before them these inspectors. They are not going to get the facts from the Civil Service Commission. They are there trying to cover up some of the facts. Ratings are made by the inspectors. Those ratings are changed by the commission. I say that because I have been so advised by some of the inspectors.

Out in my own State, for instance, in the city of Dayton—if the Senator from Arkansas will permit a further interruption for just a moment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Forest L. May had been in the Postal Service for twenty-odd years. At the beginning of the first Wilson administration he was chosen as postmaster. It was in a sense a promotion. He was thought so highly of that he was elected president of the Ohio State Postmasters' Association and president of the National Postmasters' Association. He was regarded as one of the best men in the service. He had worked up from the foundation to become postmaster of that splendid city of Dayton.

Conventions, National and State, of the postmasters were to be held. He came down to Washington and invited Postmaster General Hays to address the national convention, and delicately a reference was made by Postmaster May that the convention would be held just shortly after the expiration of his second term and that it would be perhaps a little embarrassing to him to preside over the deliberations of those conventions if he were not in fact a postmaster. Postmaster General Hays said to him in a roundabout way that the matter would be taken care of, or something to that effect. Postmaster May's four-year term expired on his birthday. His wife had arranged a picnic for some of his special friends on that day. On the evening before his birthday he received a telegram from the Post Office Department directing him to turn the keys over the next day to a politician in Dayton who had never had any experience in postal affairs. There had been no attempt to hold a civil-service examination. No charges were preferred against Mr. May. They knew they could make none, and if they made any they could not sustain them.

So on his birthday, in the afternoon between 2 and 3 o'clock, the newly appointed postmaster, with the Republican leader in that county and a Republican newspaper man, came with a camera, demanding the keys and the privilege of taking a photograph of the retiring postmaster and the new postmaster, demanding the keys at once. Mr. May suggested to them that he thought they would concede that he was entitled to that day's pay, that he had promised his wife he would go out and make some preparation for this picnic of family and friends, and asked them to come in the morning and they would then balance the cash and he would turn over the keys. "No, sir; I demand the keys now," and the keys were turned over without even permission of an opportunity to balance the cash.

The newly appointed man went on to serve several months. Finally there was an examination. Mr. May was first. Another man was second. Still another man was third, and the third man was a man of some ability, I understand. But the significant part about it all is that among the applicants for the position was a Mr. Miller, who had been State superintendent of schools and for years had been superintendent of the public schools of the city of Dayton, and he could not even get on the eligible list; but this other man without any experience in post-office affairs could. The other man was a dentist, and I am told he was a director in a house publishing some religious paper. He had some experience which would perhaps enable him in the course of time to become an average postmaster.

Mr. KING. In other words, if he pulled teeth, they wanted him to pull legs.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; to pull the Democrats' teeth.

Mr. POMERENE. I refer to this as demonstrating the situation. The reports, as I am informed, which came from the inspectors, were held up in the Civil Service Commission for a considerable time, and after awhile the man who was wanted by the politicians out there got in third place, but Professor Miller, who was competent to be superintendent of schools of the State and superintendent of the city schools, was not competent, in the eyes of the Civil Service Commission, to be placed upon the eligible list.

I am not going to take the Senator's time further. There are other cases to which I might refer. But we need not fool ourselves about the situation. The whole situation is being manipulated under the spoils system, but under the cloak of the civil service.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I have in mind several cases such as the Senator from Ohio has detailed; but when John H. Bartlett was president of the Civil Service Commission the commission perpetrated such a farce at Paragould, in Greene County, Ark., under the pretense of having an examination, that I wanted to find out what the facts were. I called up and talked to a man who said his name was Bartlett. He told me that the papers were confidential and then said they were out of his possession and could not be had. When I kept on insisting, he switched me to a man who he said was the chief examiner; but before I was permitted to talk to him he was talked to by Bartlett or some one else. I again was told that I could not see the papers; but finally I did see them, and they disclose that there had been no examination held.

The president of the commission, John H. Bartlett, when he told me there had been a competitive examination held there knew it was not the truth, because he had the papers. I have them now in my office, and they show there was no examination and there was simply a written declaration. Later I was told that some kind of a statement had been given, possibly by bankers behind closed doors, which was confidential. I understand there is not a word of truth in that; but, anyway, Mr. Bartlett showed so much skill in manipulating the civil service that he was made First Assistant Postmaster General. Some of the things that they are doing I shall take just a moment to recite.

I have referred to the threatened removal of a postmaster because he advanced $25 to a city postal clerk on his vacation. There is a man—I will not now give his name, but it is here and all the facts are known—who pretends to be a lawyer. His own nephew, who was an ex-service man, who had served in the Army in the recent war, had him write a letter to the War Risk Bureau in an effort to get his compensation adjusted. Perhaps he wrote two letters. This man charged the ex-soldier $27.50 for his services. He collected $5 and then wrote a letter to him threatening to report him to the bureau here in Washington if he did not pay $25 more. He said in his letter, "The Government has nothing to do with fixing my fees; I know how to charge, and I will make my own fees." That man wanted to be postmaster, and he filed with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] a sworn statement that this incident was not true; yet we have his letters, undisputed, showing that it is true. The Assistant Postmaster General knew officially that the pretended attorney was violating the law and trying to extort an unreasonable fee from a former ex-service man and knew that he had sworn falsely about it; still the department seems to think he is a good man to be a Republican postmaster in a very good town, indeed. All ex-service men in the State, so far as I know, except one—although dozens of them are on the eligible list and many of them were first on the list—were denied appointment.

In a town in my home county an ex-service man, a Republican, a white man, who had rendered faithful service during the recent war, a member of a splendid family, was on the list; nobody else qualified, but finally there was imported a man. His nomination is pending now in the Senate for confirmation, though he was not entitled to be appointed at all.

In the town of Gravette the department has appointed an acting postmaster who, I am informed, is too old to meet the regulations. An ex-service man, who is the first on the list, is entitled to that appointment, but the department will not appoint him. It is keeping the acting postmaster there, a man who did not take the examination and could not, first, because he is ineligible by reason of age, and, second, because he is ineligible by lack of training; yet he is the acting postmaster.

I call attention to these things for one purpose. I am not complaining overmuch. The Republicans want the places, and if they will strip the matter of hypocrisy and take them without trying to blacken people's reputations and destroy their right to earn an honest living, though we may say it is bad politics, that it is poor morals, that it is making the Government the football of politicians, at least we could somewhat respect the administration if it did that; but it should not, as in the case of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, turn out decent and honest men and women, dismiss them from the service, and put in their places men whose records are known because they are matters of court record, gamblers, men who were being divorced by their wives for infidelity, and pretend it is done for efficiency. Take the man who was put at the head of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving; not only has his wife brought suit for divorce and allegations against him for all kinds of offenses, but she has been compelled to go into court and restrain him from throwing her and her children into the street since he has been at the head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is all a matter of court record.

Now, the ax is to be again wielded. The victims are notified that they may strip themselves for execution and lay their necks under the guillotine—Elmer Dover has said it and the Post has confirmed it, and the President has not the courage to deny them what they demand. If any of the victims should desire to seek out a Member of the Senate in an effort to have an investigation as to the wrongful and cruel removal, the administration will feel assured that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] will see that no investigation is had, or at least no department required to give any reason for its acts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statements of the Senator from Arkansas are such as to call for an investigation of the person referred to, as well as all others named by the President for positions in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I am sorry the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is not present. I shall offer a resolution at an early day directing the committee of which he is chairman to make a full investigation of the character and conduct of the person referred to by the Senator from Arkansas as having offended against the law, and also to ascertain what forces were behind this person that led to his appointment by President Harding.

Mr. CARAWAY. Here is a copy of his letter. I will hand it to the Senator. The Senator might like to read it. It is a matter of court record. Here is the complaint of his wife, naming six women here in the District of Columbia, and here is the name of the girl.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is such a shocking letter purporting to have been written by this man——

Mr. ASHURST. By whom?

Mr. KING. By the man whom President Harding recently named to the highest position in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and from which he removed a man of the highest character and against whom not one word has ever been uttered. I will not put this letter in the RECORD; but it seems to me that the President, if he does his duty, if he has a proper respect for the high position which he occupies, ought to remove his appointee before the sun goes down.

I have believed that President Harding came to the Presidency with a sincere desire to serve his country and to discharge the important duties of that high office with an eye single to the welfare of the people and the preservation of this great Republic. There are, however, incidents which seem to indicate that the President does not always pursue the course dictated by his own keen sense of right and is misled by political forces which are not concerned with the public weal. There are accumulating evidences of the triumphant and dominating activities of Republican politicians; they seem to control executive departments and agencies and to influence and materially affect the conduct of the President himself.

How can the action of the President in removing faithful and competent officials from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing be justified, and how can the action of the President be explained, other than upon the ground that he was misled or deceived or greatly influenced by politicians who were willing to violate the law, set at naught the provisions of the civil service statute, and to prostitute the Government to partisan ends? I can not believe that the President, if he knew all the facts, would have so acted. I have not been able to convince myself that the President was fully advised, and have therefore assumed that he was misled by Republican politicians who sought to advance their interests and the interests of their party, regardless of the law and of the best interests of the country.

Mr. President, President Harding, for whom we all entertain an affectionate regard, has an opportunity to render signal service in this epochal period. He has a chance to be bigger than his party and to personify the hopes, aspirations, and ideals of the American people. He is a man of fine character, amiable disposition, and possesses qualities that endear him to the people. If he follows his own conscience and his own judgment, his record of service will be admirable; but if he is led by politicians, or is controlled by dark and sinister influences, he will cover himself with confusion and bring grief and defeat to the Republican Party.

Mr. President, I have no pleasure, though I am a Democrat, in mistakes and maladministration of the Republican Party. I believe in the doctrines of the Democratic Party and should like to see them carried into effect in the Nation, but I am not so partisan as to wish that the Republican administration shall enact unwise and impolitic legislation, or adopt policies that will prove harmful and dangerous to the Republic. I am more interested in the welfare of the people, in their happiness, their prosperity and progress, than I am in the triumph of any political party. I shall gladly support any measure offered by the Republicans which I believe will make for the happiness and prosperity of the American people. I shall be glad to support the President in any of his plans which I believe to be of advantage to this Republic and to the people of our country.

I congratulated the President upon his election, and I shall have pride in his labors and achievements if they redound to the honor and glory of our Nation and to the happiness of the American people. The accomplishments of all Americans, whether Republicans or Democrats, enrich the Nation and add to the patrimony of all.

I have criticized my own party when I believed it was following unsafe paths. I have condemned the Republican Party and this administration when I have been convinced that unwise and unjust measures or policies were being adopted or promoted. I sincerely regret that our Republican friends are not giving to the American people a wise and beneficent administration, and that many high in the councils of the party are seeking to pervert the Government from its legitimate ends and to employ it for partisan purposes.

Of course there will be in all parties incompetent, inefficient, and in some instances corrupt politicians who have no conception of the functions of government, the obligations under the Constitution, of those clothed with authority, or the duties and responsibilities which rest upon officials. There are those who regard the Government as legitimate prey and would use it for personal and party ends. The American people believe in their Government and in the Constitution of the United States. They want efficient and honest government. They want this Nation to be an example to all the world, and those who live under our laws to be an upright, justice-loving, Christian people. They desire the laws to be enforced and entertain a profound regard for law and order.

It is said by some that we are lacking in "constitutional morality," and are drifting from those precepts of the fathers and those ethical and moral principles which underlie enlightened and progressive government, and that in the end this Republic will go the way of those governments that have been carried to destruction by the advancing tides that have borne humanity forward. This view will be combated by most Americans, and they will point to the achievements of the American people as a sure refutation of the same.

But to return. The civil service law was placed upon the statute books in response to the conscience of the American people. While I have never had much confidence in those who have administered it, and have often felt that it was administered in a loose, inefficient, and partisan manner, nevertheless I have insisted that so long as the law existed it should be lived up to in letter and in spirit. It would be better to have no civil service law than to have an inefficient and fraudulent one. It would be a fraudulent law if its terms were disregarded and it were employed to protect partisan politicians or to put into office persons solely because of political reasons or party demands. If President Harding pursues his present course, or the course which is being demanded by Republican politicians, it will be charged, and with much truth, that he is an enemy of civil service and is doing more to destroy the law than any other force or power in the land. Theodore Roosevelt did much to develop a respect for civil service and when President attempted to strengthen the law. It would appear that President Harding has sought to weaken the law and is permitting himself to be influenced by avowed enemies of civil service, who seem to be opposed to an honest administration of public affairs. It is the duty of those who believe in civil service to lift their voices in protest against the methods employed to debauch and destroy the system. Undoubtedly the course of the administration, if persisted in, will either destroy civil service or result in such a revulsion of feeling as to place the law and its administration far above the desires of corrupt politicians or weak and vacillating administrations.

RUSSELL M. SHAW.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, it is not my intention to undertake to correct all the inaccuracies that appear in the daily newspapers, but in this morning's Washington Post there is an article on the first page headed:

Republicans seek posts in Treasury for party men.

In the list of so-called Democrats is the name of Russell M. Shaw, of New York. I merely wish to state that Mr. Shaw is not a Democrat and never has been, nor are any of his family. I have known his father and grandfather and all his relatives for many years. He has always been an ardent Republican. I merely desire to correct that inaccuracy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course I regret that Mr. Shaw is not a Democrat; but in the list I am advised that others alleged to be Democrats are not Democrats, and, of course, as the plan is to drive from office a large number of faithful employees to make places for Republicans the question whether a Republican or a Democrat makes no difference. The only question is, Are they active politicians in the Republican Party? If they are they will stay; if they are not, they will go.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I exceedingly regret that a slight cold prevents me from discussing this particular phase of the matter this morning. I desire, however, merely to say that I believe this Government was not created to make offices for partisans, and so long as men serve faithfully there ought to be some good reason for their dismissal or retention other than that they belong to one political party or another.

Mr. POMERENE. The statement just made by the Senator from Maine confirms the thought in my mind, namely, that there certainly are not 150 Democrats in the Treasury Department at this time.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On June 13, 1922:

S. 1911. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

On June 15, 1922:

S. 2014. An act to provide for the settlement of small holding claims on unsurveyed land in the State of New Mexico; and

S. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a special mission of friendship, good will, and congratulation to represent the Government and people of the United States at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11872) to amend sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Panama Canal act; to amend sections 288, 289, 342, 343, 368, and 461 of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone; and section 2 of the Executive order of July 9, 1914, establishing rules and regulations for the operation and navigation of the Panama Canal and approaches thereto, including all water under its jurisdiction; to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and to regulate divorces in the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The READING CLERK. The pending amendment is, on page 34, line 7, to strike out "$1,207,200" and to insert "$1,512,000."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendments which we are now considering under the heading "Pay of the Navy," are made necessary because of the increase in the enlisted personnel of the Navy from 67,000 to 86,000 men and the passage lately of the bill for rates of pay of Army and Navy. The House made provision for that increase in some items, but as the bill came to the Senate it was necessary for us to take care of others.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether the committee in preparing this bill took into account the proposition to fix the personnel of the Navy at the figures placed in the House bill, 67,000 or 68,000 men?

Mr. WARREN. The House bill fixed the number at 86,000 men.

Mr. KING. I mean as the bill was originally reported to the House.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; the committee of the Senate has undertaken to fit all items to the size in which it came from the House, 86,000; but the House had failed to round out some of the several different lines of appropriation, and the Senate has done that, so as to make it a well-balanced force of 86,000 instead of 67,000. Therefore if the Senator proposes to take issue with the bill on the ground of having a personnel of 86,000, if it should go to 67,000 various changes would be necessary in the bill; but as it is now it is balanced well, and in my judgment it ought to pass in the form in which it is presented to the Senate.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that as the bill was reported to the House by the House committee it did not carry the large appropriation for the personnel of 86,000.

Mr. WARREN. It did not.

Mr. KING. It carried an appropriation for a personnel of approximately 67,000.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. The question I propounded to the Senator was this: Did the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, which had under consideration the bill which is now before us, consider the proposition of a Navy of the size that was recommended to the House by the committee of the House?

Mr. WARREN. The subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, as the Senator knows, was almost exclusively composed of members of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. I think only two Senators served on the subcommittee who were not members of the Naval Affairs Committee. The change made by the House forced the Senate to do one of two things, either to turn down the proposition of 86,000 or to fit the bill to the figure of 86,000, and the committee has undertaken to do the latter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not satisfied with many of the provisions of this bill, but it will pass without any substantial change. So far as I know, few Senators are opposing it, and many seem indifferent to its provisions, though it carries $300,000,000. In my opinion it contains many extravagant features, and does not follow along the lines of rigid economy. It should be reduced at least $50,000,000 if proper economies were applied. There are too many officers provided for, and the enlisted personnel is too great. I should not hesitate to move to reduce the personnel to the limit fixed by the House committee if I believed that any considerable number of Senators would support the motion. A proper allocation and distribution of the enlisted personnel would enable the naval authorities to man the ships and give to the country an efficient Navy. The only thing that deters me from offering the motion is found in the fact that, as revealed in the New York Herald this morning in an excellent article appearing on page 6, the countries with whom we negotiated a treaty for a limitation of naval armament have not yet ratified it. There may be sufficient justification for the action of Great Britain and Italy and France and Japan in delaying ratification. I am not advised as to that. I observed in yesterday's paper that Lord Lee of Fareham presented to the House of Lords the treaty, or at least he brought it to their attention, whether or not for a vote I am not able to state.

The New York Herald article to which I have referred states that—

> While the State Department was at no time gravely alarmed over the prospect of the treaties being eventually ratified, it did not look for anything like the delays that for one reason or another they have been subjected to.

It further states:

> It has been felt all along here that the attitude of France and the disposition of the Poincaire government to mark time on the treaties constituted the principal obstacle to ratification by the other powers. In the face of intimations that France would adopt a drastic reservation to the naval treaty, it was taken for granted that the other nations, notably England and Italy, would mark time pending the evolution of French policy.
> What France has done is exactly the thing that the United States desired most to avoid. The French Government, it is felt, has made the treaties part and parcel of the European situation. That is what President Harding and Secretary Hughes desired most of all to avoid. It was with this in mind that this Government at the time of the conference abstained from the discussion of land armaments and was content to enter world affairs through the back door of the Pacific.

That may be an accurate description of the method by which the present administration seeks to get into world affairs—through the "back door." That is not the proper way or the honest way or the statesmanlike way of getting into world affairs. We ought to enter through the front door. We ought to get in through an international agreement, in which all of the powers of the world participate—if not the League of Nations, an association of nations that has for its object the abolition of war, or at least the removal of the causes of war, the promotion of world peace, the establishment of international courts and tribunals to settle controversies and adjust disputes, and the adoption of such policies as will relieve the nations from the oppressive burdens of military and naval armament which now rest upon the people.

Resuming the article:

> France knows the importance that the United States attaches to the treaties, and there is evident now in Washington a strong undercurrent of feeling among officials that there is more than a disposition to use them as a pawn in the European political-economic tangle.
>
> Premier Poincaire at no time made a public statement on the treaties. In reply to inquiries from the United States and other Governments, however, he has intimated that it would not be possible to get them through the Chamber of Deputies without a strong reservation to the naval treaty.
> American officials do not take the threat of a French reservation very seriously. The view that they really take is that the French politicians are not primarily thinking of amending the naval treaty, if at all, and that what they are really doing is withholding action on it in the belief that it constitutes a useful lever with which to compel attention to the demands of French policy in Europe.

The article then directs attention to Japan. Senators will recall that but two or three days ago Baron Kato came to the premiership ostensibly to bring about the ratification of the treaties that were negotiated at the Washington conference.

Proceeding, the article states:

> The reports that have reached the Department of State with respect to the attitude of Japan toward the treaties were said officially to be at all times encouraging. It is known, however, that it was not all plain sailing for the treaties in Tokyo any more than it is now in Paris. Things were going on behind the scenes, and the things that were going on, it is inferred, did have a bearing on the recent elevation of Admiral Baron Kato to the premiership. His elevation and the fact that he holds himself responsible for the ratification of the treaties has, to say the least, strengthened the assurance of this Government that all is well as far as Japan is concerned.

Mr. President, as stated, if it were not for the delay of these nations referred to in ratifying the treaty of Washington calling for a limitation of naval armament, notwithstanding the certainty of defeat, I should move to reduce the personnel of the Navy to the number fixed by the House committee.

I may add that the House committee gave this matter most earnest consideration. They had all the facts before them. The hearings, which are very voluminous and which I have gone through with more or less care, in my judgment support the action of the House; and we would be warranted, notwithstanding the failure of these Governments to ratify the treaties, in fixing the personnel at the limits declared in the bill as it was originally reported to the House by the subcommittee; but because of the well-known attitude of the Senate and in deference to the sentiments of many Senators growing out of the failure of the other Governments to ratify the treaty, I shall not offer the amendment which I had intended submitting reducing the naval personnel to 67,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on yesterday I submitted some observations concerning two amendments proposed by the committee—the first to strike out the appropriation for the Research Laboratory and the second to strike out the appropriation for the Naval Consulting Board.

The Naval Consulting Board is a voluntary organization. That is to say, the members receive no salary or compensation. My understanding is that they do not even receive expenses of travel. The Naval Consulting Board is a body of high-minded, public-spirited citizens, eminent in different branches of science, who have tendered to the Navy their services. The only appropriation is an appropriation for the office expenses, the salary of a secretary or clerk of $4,000.

It may be of interest to know who comprise the Naval Consulting Board. The members were nominated by the great technical and scientific societies of the country, as shown by the following list:

LIST OF MEMBERS OF NAVAL CONSULTING BOARD.

Nominated by American Institute of Mining Engineers: William L. Saunders and Benjamin B. Thayer.

Nominated by American Chemical Society: Dr. L. H. Baekeland and Dr. W. R. Whitney.

Nominated by American Institute of Electrical Engineers: Frank J. Sprague and B. G. Lamme.

Nominated by American Mathematical Society: R. S. Woodward and A. G. Webster.

Nominated by American Society Civil Engineers: A. M. Hunt and Alfred Craven.

Nominated by American Aeronautical Society: M. B. Sellers and Hudson Maxim.

Nominated by Inventors' Guild: Thomas Robins and Peter Cooper Hewitt.

Nominated by American Society Automotive Engineers: Howard E. Coffin and Andrew L. Riker.

Nominated by American Electrochemical Society: Lawrence Addicks and Joseph W. Richards.

Nominated by American Society Mechanical Engineers: W. L. R. Emmet and Spencer Miller.

Nominated by American Society of Aeronautic Engineers: Elmer A. Sperry, Henry A. Wise Wood, and Bion J. Arnold.

Nominated by War Committee of Technical Societies: D. W. Brunton.

Many of these gentlemen, it will be recognized at once, are men of national and international reputation in their various lines of activity. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has concluded to dispense with the gratuitous services of these eminent gentlemen, whose services by any of the great industrial organizations of the country, even in a consultative capacity, probably could not be secured for less than a quarter of a million dollars a year.

The Naval Consulting Board, as I indicated on yesterday, was intimately associated with the Laboratory for Scientific Research. I have the following statement in relation to the two organizations:

MEMORANDUM REGARDING NAVAL CONSULTING BOARD AND NAVAL EXPERIMENT AND RESEARCH LABORATORY.

The Naval Consulting Board is composed of engineers and scientists nominated by the several national engineering and technical societies. The members serve without compensation. During the war they rendered invaluable service to the Navy by making available on any subject the best brains of the country and starting a campaign for industrial preparedness. Together with Admiral Smith they investigated the 110,000 inventions submitted as of possible aid to the Navy. Their services, and through them the services of the national societies, are continually made available to the Navy to aid in solving technical problems. The appropriation of $4,000 pays the services of a clerk engaged in collating and recording records of the board's activities and routine work in connection with the board's activities and correspondence.

Among other things, the Naval Consulting Board advocated erection and operation of a naval research laboratory and Congress appropriated $1,500,000 for its construction. The plant is now completed, and final equipment is being installed. About $250,000 remains available for equipment, but by law can not be used for maintenance or operation. Unless money is made available now the plant must lie idle and deteriorate.

It is needless to mention the importance of research work in any engineering activity. Commercial concerns recognize its necessity and colleges provide men for its prosecution. The General Motors Co. spends $1,500,000 per year in research work and finds it good business. Germany's initial power came largely from previous research work. England now recognizes the need for naval research and provides large sums for its prosecution.

Our Navy, as well as every other, has problems inherently naval that she must solve, and solve before the other navies if she is to maintain her supremacy. Any engineer or manufacturer can recognize this fact, for others such recognition is more difficult.

An estimate of $300,000 for operation, including everything, was allowed by the Budget officer. The Navy Department, to effect economy this year, cut this sum to $100,000 and will endeavor to show results with this sum during the coming year. This amount, or perhaps even less, will enable us to get the proposition on its feet and we hope to demonstrate the value of the expenditure. The House included a provision (H. R. 11228, p. 6) for $100,000. This was struck out by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, possibly on the grounds of economy, possibly because of the other somewhat similar—though in terms only—experimental stations maintained by the Government.

The work contemplated to be undertaken by the research laboratory is primarily naval, and there is at present no other agency fitted for or provided to do this research work. While primarily for the benefit of the Navy it is inherent to the nature of the work that results also may be beneficial to the industrial activities of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWBERRY. With regard to the Naval Consulting Board, the action of the committee was predicated on the fact that the Naval Consulting Board has not functioned as a board since December, 1920, I think, when it attended the laying of the corner stone of the research laboratory. However, the patriotic professional people who are members of that board correspond freely with the department, the department consults them as individuals, because they were members of the board, whenever occasion arises, and the amount of the appropriation is not large, only $4,000. The amount expended last year under this appropriation was for the salary of the clerk, $1,400, and a few hundred dollars extra for expenses.

I am certain that the department and the Committee on Naval Affairs appreciate the services the members of the Naval Consulting Board have given. It was a war activity, and as a consulting board it has not functioned for a year. The members still consult with the department, and the department still avails itself of their experience and advice constantly.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 7, after the word "pay," to insert the words "and allowances" and in line 8 to strike out "$447,580" and to insert "pay, $631,180; rental allowance, $28,800; subsistence allowance, $13,140; in all, $673,120," so as to read:

Pay and allowances of the Nurse Corps: Pay, $631,180; rental allowance, $28,800; subsistence allowance, $13,140; in all, $673,120.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator in charge of this bill if this is an amendment which the Senator from Utah asked to have postponed?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No; I think not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood he wanted the amendments on page 34 to be passed over for the time being, and the amendments on page 35 taken up instead. Did he make such a request of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NEWBERRY. He did not make such a request while I was in the Chamber, nor did I hear of it. If he makes such a request, we can go back and have the votes reconsidered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall not object.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; the votes can be reconsidered if the Senator from Utah should desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 12, after the words "Naval Reserve Force," to insert "Class 1 (Fleet Naval Reserve) and class 6 (Naval Reserve Flying Corps)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 14, to strike out "$5,689,233," and to insert in lieu thereof $4,127,278," so as to read:

Retainer pay and active-service pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force class 1 (Fleet Naval Reserve) and class 6 (Naval Reserve Flying Corps), $4,127,278.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$107,503,239" and to insert in lieu thereof "$127,473,823."

Mr. NEWBERRY. On behalf of the committee I move to substitute for the last figures "$124,637,773," this being the correct amount.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I have just been informed by the Senator from Utah that he did make a request in regard to these amendments. I therefore beg the pardon of the Senator from Massachusetts. I did not understand we were going on with the aviation matter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the Senator from Utah had asked that that be passed over.

Mr. KING. I ask to be excused from the Chamber for about 10 minutes so that I may get a little luncheon, and that the Senate take up the other items in my absence.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I inquired of the Senator from Michigan if such a request had been made, but he had forgotten that it had been made.

Mr. NEWBERRY. We will take up the amendment, on page 35, line 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 35 the committee proposes to strike out lines 1 to 13, inclusive, in the following words:

Not to exceed 200 graduates of the Naval Academy of the class of 1922 shall be commissioned as ensigns in the Navy, and the graduates to be commissioned shall be selected by the academic board of the Naval Academy after giving equal consideration to the scholastic standing and adaptability for naval service of each graduate: Provided, That each graduate of the Naval Academy of the class of 1922 who is not commissioned as an ensign in the Navy shall be paid mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile from the Naval Academy to his home and a sum equal to three months' pay of a midshipman, such payments to be made from the respective appropriations in this act providing for the transportation and pay of midshipmen.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I ask that that amendment may be passed over until the return of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Let us take up the amendment beginning on line 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 35, beginning in line 17, the committee proposes to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to employ on active duty, during the fiscal year 1923 only, not to exceed 50 reserve officers who are qualified naval aviators: Provided further, That such officers may, prior to July 1, 1923, after successfully passing such examinations to determine their qualifications as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, be transferred to and appointed in the regular Navy in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920.

Mr. SWANSON. Before that amendment is disposed of, Mr. President, I want to move to strike out the language which it proposes to amend contained in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Beginning in line 14?

Mr. SWANSON. Beginning in line 14, page 35, as follows:

The authorization contained in section 2 of the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921 for the employment of 500 reserve officers in the aviation and auxiliary service is hereby repealed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That should be stricken out.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator want to have that done at this time, when the Senator from Washington is not in the Chamber?

Mr. SWANSON. I appeal to the committee to let this go to conference with the other. We have now a little over 200 reserve officers. This authorization, which was given in the appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, provided for the employment of 500 officers in the reserve, auxiliary, and aviation in excess of the 4 per cent provided by law. Under the law we can not employ commissioned officers in excess of 4 per cent of the authorized enlisted personnel.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator is now alluding to the provision of the House?

Mr. SWANSON. I am.

Mr. WARREN. Such an amendment would not be in order now.

Mr. SWANSON. It is in order, for the simple reason that the committee amendment is now pending, and if that goes out, this should go out also.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, we have permission to act on the amendments of the committee first.

Mr. SWANSON. If the committee amendment is adopted, I might be precluded from moving to strike out this provision.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. The Senator can move to amend the text after the committee amendments have been acted upon.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me that if this is adopted as an amendment to the committee amendment, it would fix its status.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator can move to strike it all out later on, both the old and the new.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what I wish to move.

Mr. NEWBERRY. My understanding is that we are proceeding only with committee amendments to the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. SWANSON. If the committee amendment is adopted, it will be new language added to the provision of the House. The only thing I was apprehensive of was that if the amendment of the committee were adopted I would be precluded; I want to have it distinctly understood that I shall have a right later to move to strike out the House text. If unanimous consent is given, I shall not press the matter.

Mr. NEWBERRY. That will be understood.

Mr. SWANSON. Is unanimous consent given, so that I can move to strike out the House provision later?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that the word "Provided," also should come out when that amendment is made?

Mr. SWANSON. Of course.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to commend the committee for the amendment which they have recommended on page 35, providing that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to employ on active duty, during the fiscal year 1923 only, not to exceed 50 reserve officers who are qualified naval aviators. I think this is a very meritorious amendment. The history of this legislation is most interesting. The reserve officers in naval aviation performed very excellent service to the country during the war. After the war many of them remained in the service, expecting in due time that they would be accepted into the regular Navy. Provision was made by Congress for the induction into the regular Navy of 500 of these reserve officers when found qualified after examination. An examination was held in May of last year, and as a result of that examination a large number of these highly qualified reserve officers failed. The examination was based upon the theory that naval aviators should be familiar with the duties of line officers, and should be able to qualify and pass examinations which line officers have to pass.

I personally think that policy is a very grave mistake. I think aviation is a specialty, and is a department of the defense of our country which ought to be separated from the regular line duties of the Navy and of the Army. But I find myself in a minority in that conclusion. The Navy officers and the Naval Committee are of the opinion that naval aviators should be willing and ready and qualified to go to sea and navigate surface craft as well as navigate airships in the air. I firmly believe time will prove the unsoundness and shortsightedness of this course. I believe it will not be many years before transportation by air will make the larger types of surface craft obsolete.

To my mind this present policy simply means that we are never going to have a well-qualified and well-developed Air Service in this country. There is no more reason why a naval aviator should be expected to qualify and perform sea duty than that a medical officer in the Naval Medical Corps should be expected to pass an examination in engineering and navigation. This policy is about as sane as it would be to order expert aviators to navigate battleships every two years. Yet that is what is contemplated. If aviators must be line officers they must go to sea and take up the duties of line officers or they will be unable to pass the promotion examinations that are given from time to time, for all examinations emphasize line officers' work and duties, to wit, navigation at sea. Air and sea navigation are entirely separate and distinct vocations, in my opinion. However, that is a departure from what I wanted to call to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I would call the Senator's attention to the fact that after a man has been an aviator for 10 years he is through; that is, he can not go on in aviation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Oh, Mr. President, that theory has been exploded.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what the department think, at any rate, and consequently they want to have this plan adopted. The examinations have been too rigorous and too exacting. We ought to have a reasonable examination of some kind, so that when aviators have served for 8 or 10 years they can then perform some service in the Navy and not be retired and become an expense to the Government. We ought to be able to do something along that line, it would seem to me.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator does not want to get in trouble with the aviators, he had better stop making such assertions. One of the leading aviators of the Navy to-day is a man 48 years old. I refer to Capt. H. Mustin, of the regular Navy. He stoutly denies the assertion that the duration of an aviator's service is 10 years. Many other young officers have been flying over eight years and they consider themselves capable of flying for very many more years. The leading and ranking flying officer of the Army, Gen. William Mitchell, is a man well over 40 years and is still an active aviator.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not attempting to get into trouble with the aviators or with anybody else. I am talking for the good of the service. I think that this examination was too rigorous and was uncalled for, but I do think we ought to require some examination so that if a man is an aviator and has had experience as an aviator, after he ceases to be an aviator he will be able to do something for the Navy.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator know of one man who has ceased to be an aviator?

Mr. SWANSON. Not at this time, because aviation has been in existence only some five or six years.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are men in the Army and Navy who have been aviators for 8 or 10 years, if not longer.

Mr. SWANSON. Aviation only started some five or six years ago. The naval authorities have told me that after a man has served actively in aviation for 10 years he ought to be transferred to something else, because of its dangers and excessive activities. I tried to get the department to have a less rigorous examination. The only thing I want is to get these 50 men, although I would agree to have 100 if it could be done. But we ought to have certain requirements so there will not be so many retired aviators doing nothing. They could go on shore duty of some kind. Examinations ought to be held in a way that will enable a man to show certain qualifications to do some kind of naval work, whatever he can do, after he ceases his activities as an aviator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has the same opinion that is entertained by many high naval officials who are not aviators, but I defy him to prove by any aviator in the Navy or Army that the duration of active service is limited to 10 years. In fact, that matter was discussed by a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee and very thoroughly gone into, but the theory was exploded. Indeed, even after a man gets to be 50 or 60 years of age and retires from aviation there are many duties suitable for him, such as officer in charge of aviation stations, such as executive officer in the aviation department, and so forth. Furthermore, all of the airships being constructed are constantly increasing in size and are being directed and commanded by men who do not actually pilot the machine at all. It is very important and very essential that the commanding officer, who is not at the wheel actually conducting the physical movements necessary to propel the machine, shall be experienced as an aviator. Almost every large airship that is being built now has crews of 5, 10, 15, or many more men, and therefore there will always be need of experienced aviators to act as commanders of those ships. One of the big rigid airships now under construction will have a crew of approximately 30 men. The commanding officers on such airships do not handle the controls, but act as supervisors.

However, that is a departure from the question I was about to discuss. I do not think the Senator from Virginia and myself differ about the merits of the amendment.

Referring to the length of time given to prepare for the examination, let me say this: Men who for five years have done nothing but fly, have done nothing but devote all their talents and energy and strength to perfecting themselves in aviation, were notified eight months before the examination that they must pass all the requirements that are expected of graduates of the Annapolis Academy, including navigation, seamanship, electricity, ordnance, engineering, and so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator, Who issued that order?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Secretary of the Navy, acting upon the advice of the Bureau of Navigation, who are old line naval officers.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not possible to require the members of that board to undergo a similar examination, to see whether or not they could pass it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It ought to be possible. I want the Senator to follow me, because I know from questions he asked yesterday that he is interested. Congress authorized 500 of these men in the regular service. Only about 290 applied for examination. The result of the first marking of the examination papers was that 27 passed. The aviation paper only counted 10 points out of 100, so that no matter how capable they were, how proficient they were, how competent they were in aviation, they were rejected if they did not know line-officers' duties and problems. What happened? The rejection of these men meant that we were to lose from the Aviation Service the very men who went through the war, some of whom served their country in France, and who had had the experience of preparing under stress of war to learn how to direct an airplane and how to carry on plane tactics in the air—in a word, the men who developed our naval air service.

Mr. POMERENE. Was that examination conducted by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; it was not conducted by the Civil Service Commission. It was conducted by a board of naval officers. Bear in mind these men were never at sea or given any opportunity to do sea duty in the Navy. The first marking permitted only 27 to pass. Of course, that is a confession in itself that the examination was unfair and was too severe. How could men pass an examination, for instance, in navigation with no experience on a ship? Re-markings of the papers from time to time led to the acceptance of about 150.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, re-markings of the same papers?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. In that way they increased the number who passed from 27 to 150?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; a re-marking upon a different basis than was originally contemplated. Everybody, for instance, failed on the first marking who did not get 2.5 points on every paper, 4 being the maximum. In the re-marking they said, "If a candidate does get less than 2.5 on two papers, we will still admit him." On the third marking, they said, "Even if he gets less than 2.5 on four papers, we will let him in."

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know who constitutes that board, but I wonder if it were possible to hold an examination for those who are hereafter to be members of the board? I wonder whether the present board could pass such an examination?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that the members of the Naval Affairs Committee appreciated the character of the criticism which I am making against that examination and recognized the injustice inflicted upon these young reserve officers, and have made provision in the bill to correct in great part the injustice that was done. I say that in commendation of the committee, but there is one very serious defect still left. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] particularly to this because I think he as representing the committee will agree with me.

The bill provides that 50 of these officers, young men who left their schools and colleges in this country the first week of the war and volunteered, shall not be turned out the first day of July, after five years of patriotic and useful service, as if there were no appreciation by the Government of their aviation experience and exceptional training. I know a young man who was a witness before the committee, one of the men who failed, who was an expert in aviation bombing, and who met with an accident last December, paralyzing his vocal chords. He can not speak above a whisper. He can not tell the difference in the kinds of food that he eats. He, in all probability, if the precedents in similar cases are to be believed, will die from starvation; and yet that man, if the reserve officers who failed are retired, will be walking the streets after the 30th of June, with his wife and child, without occupation and without compensation—literally thrown in the scrap heap as waste material.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is correct about that. There are 500 men now, most of them reserve officers, who served during the war, part of them as auxiliary officers and part of them as naval officers, who have gone through all the dangers and turmoil and exactions of war service. In order to enable those 500 men to remain in the service of the Navy, this amendment was placed on the bill, authorizing the employment of 500 extra men in the aviation and auxiliary service.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is what I said.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the amendment is not made, that is exactly what will happen.

Mr. SWANSON. Unless this amendment shall be adopted, these men all go out on the 30th of June. My contention is that by striking out this amendment we can abolish that provision and then let the matter go to conference and in the meantime find out the number of good aviators whom we want in the service, and then fix up an amendment that will not let them be driven out of the service in this way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator can fix up all the amendments he wants to, but that does not fix the examination papers or change the viewpoint of reactionary naval officers. The difficulty is that the examinations are so exacting and deemed of such importance by the old-line officers of the Navy that these men were unable to pass them, and therefore can not remain in the service.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is entirely correct. The minute I saw the examinations I knew they were wrong. I protested against them. I insisted that we should have some kind of an examination that these men who had seen actual service, as these officers had, could pass. I insisted that the examinations were entirely too severe. They ought to be examined as to character, a certain amount of educational examination ought to be required, but if the amendment of the committee is adopted they can not take care of more than 50 aviators. The man in Utah, for instance, will not be taken care of, and that is the difficulty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think, perhaps, it is only fair to say that perhaps some of these men are not fit. They may not all be mentally and physically fit. I can understand that. I would like to have them all taken care of. But a compromise is better than nothing. The Committee on Appropriations have only provided for 50. We must take what we can get. The harm will be greatly reduced by taking in 50.

Mr. SWANSON. This matter was acted on very hurriedly. Some of the auxiliary officers have been in the Navy from 17 to 20 years. Some of them have been in the Aviation Service and some of them in the naval service direct. On the 30th of June they all go out, unless we make provision for them. I would like to see this provision stricken out and the matter go to conference, so as to see if we can not fix up some provision that will take care of these deserving men.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I quite agree with what the Senator has said. I shall be glad to cooperate with him to the end that the auxiliary officers may also be taken care of.

I want to call to the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is always interested in saving money for the Treasury, that it was proposed to drive out of the service 86 trained aviators. It costs about $40,000 to train an aviator. It was proposed, until this amendment in part modified it, to scrap about $3,500,000 expended in the training of these men and proceed at once to train a similar number of aviators to take their places at this enormous expense. A recent order has been issued asking for 50 men from the graduating class at Annapolis or line officers to enter training for the Naval Air Service at an expense to the Government of $40,000 per capita. Think of this wasteful policy at a time when everybody is crying for economy.

All I have said is to lead up to another injustice which needs to be remedied, and I am going to offer an amendment to this end. It is proposed now to continue 50 of these men who failed in their examinations as reserve officers in the Air Service. They are to be taken in as reserve officers at their former rank. What is going to happen? The men who failed are to go into the Navy as lieutenants, senior grade, lieutenants, junior grade, and some as ensigns; but the men who passed have nearly all been reduced in rank when they entered the regular Navy and the men who passed the examination will thus have lower ranks than those who have not passed the examination. Some of those men who failed will go in as lieutenants, senior grade, and will have under them as ensigns men who have passed the examination and who were lieutenants, senior grade, as reserve officers.

This examination has done two things. It causes a great many of the naval aviators to fail completely and to be driven out next July if this committee amendment is not adopted. Secondly, it reduces in rank all or nearly all of those who passed the examinations. The men who have been reduced in rank after they passed the examinations will find themselves, after this amendment is in operation, having a lower grade and a lower salary than some who failed in the examination. To that end I am going to propose an amendment authorizing the Secretary to give all of those who have been reduced in rank the rank held by them on May 16, 1921, and carry them as extra numbers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that following the war, with the reduction of the number of enlisted men, there were necessarily reductions in the grade of some of the officers. Assuming that information to be accurate, it would very properly follow that there would be some reductions in the grade of the class of aviation officers to whom my friend has referred. Was there a greater reduction in grade in that branch than in other branches of the service?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, as a matter of fact there were no reductions in grade in the naval aviation service; the reserved officers were frequently promoted. The strange thing about the officers who failed in the examination is that since the war nearly every one of them has been promoted twice upon recommendation of their superior officers on the basis of their efficiency and their ability as aviators, and yet they failed in the examinations and are now held by the Navy officials as unfit for the regular Navy.

As the Senator knows, the aviation service is somewhat different from the other branches of the Navy. Length of service and hours in the air is a very important factor in determining the efficiency and ability and the capability of an aviation officer. The morale in the aviation service of the Navy has been materially impaired. Nearly 300 young men who went through the war, who had become exceptionally competent aviators and had shown themselves experts of the very highest character, have had one of two things happen to them: Either they have been reduced in rank or are about to be rejected as having failed to pass the line officers' examination.

Training during the war can not be duplicated in peace times. For instance, a young man who goes into training now does not fly on certain days, whereas during the war no day could be lost. Whether the weather was stormy or windy, despite the condition of the weather, every day was used and the training was intensive and continuous. So the aviators who were trained during the war are specially well qualified for the Air Service—have enjoyed an experience that is invaluable.

Let me remind the Senate that it is a very disheartening thing, if indeed not cruel, for young officers who have gone through the war, been in the service for five years, been promoted and recommended to additional increased rank and salary, then to be told that they are no longer useful to the country; that they are to be reduced in rank and, in some cases, that they are to be dismissed from the service. Such conditions contribute to the unrest in this country. The fact that the Government should keep these men largely because the service would break down without them and then after five years tell them, when they have trained academy naval men to fly in their places, that their services are no longer needed has contributed greatly to the demoralization of our Naval Air Service and the opposition among civilians to Regular Army and Navy officers. If they had realized that they were not going to be permanently retained in the service they would have left the Navy after the armistice was concluded and sought other employment. Many of them have married and have families, and now, on the 1st day of July, if this amendment is not adopted—and even with the amendment many of them will suffer that fate—they are to be sent out into the world to look for other employment. Not a very considerate way to treat war heroes—not one that conduces to civilian willingness to sacrifice—for this treatment borders on ingratitude.

Let me say in this connection that there is not any branch of the service in the late war that, in my opinion, commanded the enthusiastic support and devotion of a higher class of American youth than the naval aviation service. Most of these men are college men; they came from our universities and colleges and entered the service during the first weeks of the war.

I think every witness who appeared before the committee was able to show an enlistment during the first week of the war. They have become devoted to the service; they have decided to make aviation their career and their life work; they have been doing this work for their country for five years, only to find out that aviation is secondary; that they must be navigators; that they must be able to go to sea; that they must be able to command naval vessels, and that aviation after all is not much different in the view of many naval line officers from service in the boiler room of a battleship; that it is only an incident to the defense of the country, but not an important arm of defense. It is a very serious matter. We are slipping seriously in our aviation development. We are greatly underestimating the future importance of this science. We will regret such indifference toward, and cold-blooded treatment of, these high-class, patriotic, and experienced aviators.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there is grave injustice involved in the position in which these aviation officers find themselves. These men gave valiant service. Naval aviation was perhaps the most dangerous branch of the service during the war. The naval aviators were compelled to perform their work out on the ocean in all kinds of weather, and the fatalities were great. These men have been in the service for five years, and now they are to be turned adrift. It is not just to them, and in addition it tends to the demoralization of the Navy. I think that we ought to take care of more than 50 of them. I do not think it is right that the others should be practically dismissed from the service.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BALL. The provision for 50 will take care of almost all the officers who failed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not of those who served during the war.

Mr. BALL. To give the exact figures there were 244 who took the examination, and of that number 152 passed—that is, 62.3 per cent passed—leaving the difference between the 244 and 152, which is 92. I think there are only 78 who are known. This proposed amendment will take care of the best qualified of those officers.

Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee which made the inquiry in reference to this matter, I desire to state that the committee was satisfied that the examination which was accorded to these officers was fair; they were satisfied that they were treated properly in every way, but the committee were not satisfied that they had been afforded a sufficient opportunity to qualify themselves with the assistance of instructors to prepare for the examination in navigation and in seamanship and in some of the other necessary branches of such an examination. For that reason the committee made this recommendation.

I repeat that the committee amendment will—and I understand the Senator from Massachusetts agrees with me—take care of the officers who are really needed in the Navy for aviation purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes. It is a great help in solving the problem. It is the best compromise that could be obtained.

Mr. BALL. I think this amendment is amply fair to all and that it will afford to these officers the advantage of having another year in order to qualify themselves for the examination.

As the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, they are all high-class men; most of them are college graduates. There is no doubt in the minds of the committee that the naval aviation officers thought they would be appointed without taking any examination, and therefore many of them did not try properly to qualify themselves, while others did not have an opportunity to do so. It is for this reason that this recommendation is made. It will give them another opportunity. Some of them were serving in line of duty up to within two weeks of the examination. In other instances we found that one or two had not had the advantage of competent instruction, and so, as it was, they had to go it alone. We think, therefore, it is but fair that they should be given another opportunity and be retained in the service for another year. I am sure, however, that the Navy Department, in the examination provided, was eminently fair to these officers, as I think the Senator from Massachusetts will admit.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should admit it if I took the position, which I refuse to take, that an aviator must be qualified to navigate a battleship in order to be an efficient officer in the American Navy.

Mr. BALL. I think that it is the opinion of the committee that the Navy Department is correct in its attitude, that an aviator in the future in order to go with the fleet must be able to command; that he must be familiar with navigation and with seamanship and with the other naval subjects. These examinations were competitive to enable these officers to enter the line of the Navy. To do that they must of necessity be qualified in branches other than aviation. In the future there is no doubt that the aviator will be with the fleet to a very great extent; the fleet is to have airplane carriers, and it will be absolutely essential, in the judgment of the committee, that the aviators shall qualify themselves in all the different naval branches. In view of the fact, however, that they were not afforded sufficient opportunity in some respects to do that, the committee have made this recommendation. I think the committee has acted very wisely and that the Senate should accept the amendment without further discussion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Delaware does not mean to suggest that I should not discuss an amendment which I should like to offer to expand and enlarge the committee amendment. I think the Senator from Delaware deserves a great deal of credit for his patience and for his interest in this problem; but I must say in passing, in reply to what the Senator has said, that I can not agree that a naval aviator has got to be a seaman and to be familiar with the navigation of naval craft as well as aircraft in order to be an efficient officer in the regular Navy. In a few years we will laugh at such a condition being imposed. We might just as well say a regular naval officer must know how to fly an airship before he can navigate a torpedo boat at sea.

The fact is that the Regular Army took over the reserve aviation officers on their record as aviators without any further examination, and the Marine Corps did the same. The aviators in the reserve corps of the Navy have been penalized for being in the Navy rather than the Army by being required to become familiar with every single branch of the Navy in order to pass the examination for the regular Navy.

That has not been required of the aviators in the Army or in the Marine Corps. However, I shall not discuss that any further. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment which I desire to offer to the committee amendment, for I know the Senator from Delaware desires to help relieve the situation. I have commended the amendment of the committee and I am willing to accept it as a compromise, for it is going to afford considerable relief. If it is not adopted all the young officers will go out. The amendment will at least save to the country and to the service 50 good men, and it is a commendable recommendation of which I heartily approve, and I compliment the Senator from Delaware for his share and part in having it reported by the committee; but what are we going to say to those who have been reduced in rank? If we should exercise our power to prevent an injustice to these 50, we should do the same for those who have been reduced in rank. The amendment which I offer will give an opportunity to the Secretary of the Navy to give to the officers who have been reduced in rank—and there are only 60 of them—extra numbers, which will give them their old rank. Then they will not be put in the position of having the reserve officers who failed and are reinstated given a higher rank over them, but they will hold their old rank. I think it is only fair and just, and I ask the chairman of the committee to accept the amendment and allow it to go to conference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, is the amendment printed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will read it:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to carry as extra numbers, and at the grades held by them on May 16, 1921, 69 officers, formerly of class 5, United States Naval Reserve Force, who were commissioned in the line of the Navy at reduced grades as a result of an examination held on such date.

That gives him authority to readjust the ranks of these men—I will send this amendment to the Senator's desk—so that there will be no discrimination, and we will not have the spectacle of an officer who has failed being made a lieutenant, senior grade, and an officer who passed being an ensign.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. I think it is right as far as the permanent grade is concerned; but, as the Senator knows, during the war all the officers of the regular Navy had a temporary rank and a permanent rank. A great many of these naval aviators and regular officers had what was called a temporary rank on account of the size of the Navy. I think the contention is right that they ought not to lose their permanent rank, but I am afraid the Senator's amendment would retain them in the temporary rank that they had at that time when every other naval officer has been reduced.

Many naval officers who were lieutenant commanders have been reduced to first lieutenants because their rank was temporary. If we hold them to the permanent rank which they held as of that date, I think that is right; but I do not see why they should be held up to their temporary rank when every other naval officer has been reduced.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let me give the Senator an illustration. I know several young men, reserve officers, who are specialized experts in aeronautics. Prior to this examination they were lieutenants, senior grade. As a result of the examination they were reduced to ensigns. Of course, they are discouraged, and will probably not remain long in the Navy. The result of this amendment would be that some of these men who failed will come in and be lieutenants, senior grade, and those who passed but were reduced in rank will still be ensigns. This amendment will permit the Secretary of the Navy to carry these men as extra numbers and put them all on an equal basis.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will put in the word "permanent," so as to make it read "the permanent grades held by them" at that time, it will be all right; but to give them the temporary rank which they held as of that time will give them precedence over any other naval officers. If it were made the permanent rank it would prevent any discrimination against them.

On account of the size of the Navy, a naval officer had two ranks. He was a temporary commander and he was a permanent first lieutenant. Most of the others have been reduced, since the Navy has been reduced, to what is known as the permanent rank. I think the Senator is right about these naval officers if his amendment refers to the permanent rank, but if it would retain them in their temporary rank when everybody else has been reduced it is not right.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is not necessary to put in the word "permanent." Under my amendment they would hold on the extra list the rank for which they were examined.

Mr. SWANSON. It puts them on the extra list, but gives them permanent commissions as of the rank they held at that date. As I have stated, the various officers had two ranks, one temporary and one permanent. We did not give them permanently higher rank, because a Navy based on three or four hundred thousand men with 4 per cent of officers would have more lieutenant commanders, would have more admirals, would have more captains, and so on, than a smaller Navy. When the Navy was reduced the officers went back to their permanent rank. I think the Senator's amendment will be right if he will make it apply to the permanent rank which they held as of that date.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am asking the Secretary to put these men on the extra list. The Secretary now keeps an extra list. There are now 57 line officers carried as extra numbers, and he can put these former reserve officers on the extra list pending the readjustment of this unsatisfactory situation. This course will prevent some men who passed these examinations holding inferior rank to men who did not pass the examinations.

May I ask the Senator from Washington if the amendment meets with his approval?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have only had time to glance over it. I should like an opportunity to consider just what effect it would have.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest, then, that we adopt the committee amendment in the bill, and that this matter be taken up later, after the Senator has had time to consider it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will pass it over and offer it at a later date I shall be very glad to give it consideration in the meantime.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think there is no opposition to accepting now the committee amendment that is printed in the bill, and then later I can offer the amendment which I have just discussed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will agree that the Senator may offer it, and I will not make any point of order as to the parliamentary status of it; but I have not had an opportunity to consider it on its merits.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. I should like to say to the Senator that I did not have the amendment prepared until this morning, or else I would have submitted it to him, had I had an opportunity.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether, so far as the investigation or inquiry has thus far disclosed, there was any discrimination against the men for whose benefit this amendment was tendered because they were not graduates of Annapolis?

I remember that this matter was brought to my attention several months ago, and I was very much interested in having an investigation made, because I thought a grave injustice had been done to these men; and from some information which I obtained I reached the conclusion that there was a clique in the Navy that was determined to drive out of the officers' corps all men who were not graduates of the Naval Academy if enough men could be found in the Navy who were graduates of the Naval Academy to fill all of the offices that would be created and that then existed. I should like to know whether or not there is anything in the investigation that reveals any prejudice against these men because they were not graduates of the Naval Academy.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BALL. I am very frank to say that there was no discrimination. The boys received every consideration, and a higher percentage of the aviation boys passed than of any of the other reserve officers. Of course, none of these were graduates from Annapolis. They were the reserve officers generally that took the examination. The appropriation bill of 1920 carried with it certain provisions authorizing the transfer of a certain number of reserve officers to the line, and authorized this examination. A larger percentage of the aviation boys passed than of any of the others.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, the Senator refers to the final marking, when only 27 passed. In the beginning, out of 290, that was not a very large percentage. It was the final marking to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, to show that the Navy had no desire to do injustice to these men or to discriminate against them, I will state that it was at the request of the Navy that this amendment was passed.

Mr. BALL. There was no chance for any discrimination.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What was the statement of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. The Navy Department asked the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate to pass this amendment authorizing these reserve officers to be taken into the line of the Navy. No officer in the Reserve Corps is a Naval Academy graduate. They were men from outside. If they had been Naval Academy graduates they would have been in the regular Navy and would not have needed this legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and I were on the subcommittee, I think, that prepared the bill at that time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator state that the Navy Department asked for this amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. The Navy Department asked for the transfer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This is the man who asked for that amendment—the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. BALL. The Navy Department asked for the amendment adopted in the appropriation bill of 1920, authorizing the transfer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of 500?

Mr. BALL. Of 1,500, I think; 500 of whom were to be from the aviators.

Mr. SWANSON. If I mistake not, the Navy Department asked us to authorize them to transfer to the regular Navy and issue commissions to 800 officers—I think it was 800—and I think we gave them authority to do so as to 500.

Mr. BALL. No; it was 1,500.

Mr. SWANSON. One thousand five hundred, or a large number, and we gave them the authority as to 500; but they were insistent that more officers should be transferred from the reserve—none of those in the reserve were graduates of the Naval Academy—and should be authorized to be given commissions in the regular Navy.

Mr. BALL. I should like to add, if the Senator will permit me, that in that appropriation bill it was further provided that they could take not more than 500 from the Aviation Corps.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Virginia a moment ago that reductions occurred in the grades of the officers of the Navy, I should like to state that as I read this bill there are no reductions. The men who received these high grades—admirals, or commanders, or vice admirals, or what not—when we had a Navy very much larger than at present, are going to retain those grades.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken to this extent: There is a deficiency of officers. We can have 4 per cent of officers on the authorized strength of the Navy. Then the number of those officers is divided. A certain percentage are admirals, 1½ per cent; a certain percentage are captains; a certain percentage of those officers must be commanders and lieutenant commanders and first lieutenants and second lieutenants; but that is based on the number of officers. If you are entitled to have 10,000 officers, and have only 5,000, you divide them on the number of officers you have, not on the number you are authorized to have. During the war we authorized them to make up the deficiency of the regular officers by people coming in from the reserve, which would give them the full quota of officers temporarily. Then they were based on that. Then, when these temporary officers retired, the grades went back to the permanent basis.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact, in the Navy as in the Army, that many young men just out of West Point or out of Annapolis were promoted within a short time to lieutenant and captain and major, so that when the war was over we had young men of 23 and 24 years of age who were majors and perhaps holding higher positions?

Mr. SWANSON. They were promoted in the Navy temporarily, because they had a certain percentage, and had a right to fill up the percentage according to seniority until they passed the rank of lieutenant commander, and a great many of these naval cadets were promoted very rapidly; but those who were promoted very rapidly were given temporary promotions based on making up the deficiency by temporary appointments. A great many of them have been reduced. Men that were lieutenant commanders have gone back to first lieutenants and first lieutenants have gone back to second lieutenants. As soon as the Navy was reduced, this deficiency of officers compelled it.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator a further question? If we had very many more in the Navy than we have to-day—if we had a personnel, say, of 100,000 instead of 86,000, as provided by this bill—would we not have sufficient officers now of the higher grades without any more promotions?

Mr. SWANSON. No; because there is a deficiency now, I think, of about 1,200 officers, and the number of captains and the number of admirals is based not on the officers authorized but on the number that there really are. Having a deficiency of officers, we can have only 1½ per cent of the officers we have for a grade like admiral. I think that is the number. In the case of captains, I think it is 8 or 10 per cent. It depends on the number of officers you have, and not on the authorized strength; but, having a deficiency of officers, we let the number be filled up by reserve officers during the war, which filled up the grades temporarily.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator again: Suppose that Congress should fix the enlisted personnel at 50,000 instead of 86,000; what would become of the officers in those higher grades?

Mr. SWANSON. The number is fixed on the authorized strength. We have always had more officers than enlisted men, because if you expand you are bound to expand with officers, or else you can not expand at all until the officers are available. It is not based on the number of men you have; it is based on the authorized strength of the Navy. The authorized strength of the Navy, I think, is 137,000 or 142,000. It is based on that.

Mr. KING. And is that the plan in this bill?

Mr. SWANSON. It is the plan all the time. It always has been based on the authorized strength of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Then we are fitting the officers' cloth, so to speak, to the theory that there are 136,000 men in the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. No; because we always have had a deficiency by reason of limiting the number of graduates from the Naval Academy. There is a deficiency now of 1,200 officers. I doubt whether the officers' strength is much more than the proper proportion to the real strength of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator how many officers ought there to be on active duty—live officers, in contradistinction to dead ones or moribund ones—for a Navy of 86,000?

Mr. SWANSON. Four per cent was the basis which we fixed, which was about 1 per cent less than in the case of the English Navy. The number of commissioned officers is 4 per cent of the personnel. One and one-half per cent would be admirals, a certain percentage captains, a certain percentage lieutenant commanders, and a certain percentage commanders. The rest of them are first and second grade lieutenants.

Mr. KING. When the Senator mentions 4 per cent, where does he fix the beginning of the officers, with the ensigns?

Mr. SWANSON. The graduates become ensigns.

Mr. KING. That is, you begin classifying them as officers when they are commissioned as ensigns, not boatswains, or anything lower than an ensign?

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. KING. Then, under the law, 4 per cent of the enlisted personnel being a proper complement of officers, with a Navy of 86,000 men there would be 4 per cent of the 86,000.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the basis, but they have never gotten up to the authorized strength. The law has provided that the complement of officers shall be 4 per cent of the authorized strength.

Mr. KING. It looks to me as though there ought to be some limitation upon the number of officers. If we limit the personnel of the Navy, there ought to be a limitation on the number of officers. Instead of computing the number of officers upon the actual enlisted personnel, the proposition is to perpetuate the policy pursued, and base the number of officers upon a purely arbitrary and hypothetical assumption of the number of men in the Navy. Following that theory you may have double or treble the number of officers required in the Navy, depending upon the reduction in the personnel. We found in the Army a short time ago that they had no second lieutenants and very few first lieutenants, but a multitude of majors, generals, and major generals. We had few privates, but a tremendous number of officers. So we are soon to have the Navy filled up with officers instead of enlisted men. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington how many officers, including the grade of ensign, provision is made for in this bill, if he has those figures at hand?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Provision is made for about 5,260.

Mr. KING. That is nearly double the number of officers necessary for the enlisted personnel provided for. May I ask the Senator whether it is contemplated that there should be any reduction at all, or are we to proceed on this policy of recruiting the officers up to the standard of 136,000 enlisted personnel, although next year we might reduce the personnel to 50,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why does the Senator select 136,000 enlisted strength as the basis upon which the number of officers is computed? I get a great deal of instruction from what the Senator from Utah says, but it seems to me, if I may say so, that he bases his attack upon the provisions of the bill and upon the establishment of the Navy upon meager information which he picks up in a hasty, haphazard debate upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator deny the statement of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KING. Then, the Senator has no right to make that charge, any more than I have to make a charge against him, that he, in a haphazard way——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want to make any charge of that sort. I have a very high respect and regard for the Senator from Utah, and do not want to make any invidious remarks. I am not making any charges, but the commissioned personnel of the Navy is not based upon an enlisted strength of 136,000.

Mr. KING. I asked the Senator from Virginia, in view of the statement he made to the Senator from Wisconsin, whether there were reductions in the grades of the officers in the Navy, and in the course of his reply he stated to me that the number of officers now in the Navy was based upon the theory that the enlisted strength of the Navy would be 136,000 men.

Mr. SWANSON. It is 4 per cent of the authorized strength of the Navy, which I think is either 137,000 or 141,000 or 142,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The exact number is 131,485; but I was commenting upon the uncertainty of the conclusion. Suppose we should accept the recommendation of the Senator from Utah, his recommendation being based upon a chance remark some other Senator makes. I think Congress would be misled by that, and we would soon have the Navy and the whole country in a very bad fix if we did not make further inquiry and if there was no further consideration of these matters.

Mr. KING. The Senator has been investigating the subject, and he knows, as well as anybody, the number of officers provided for and the basis of the provision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes, I know; but the Senator from Utah does not know. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. KING. I took the word of the distinguished Senator from Virginia. If I had been privileged to participate in the framing of the bill, I would have known that fact.

The Senator denies a part of the statement of the Senator from Virginia, but he admits the number, 131,000. To that extent the Senator from Virginia is wrong. The Senator from Virginia said 136,000 or perhaps 141,000. The Senator from Washington, with his superior knowledge, states that it is a little over 131,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What does the Senator from Utah give as his figure?

Mr. KING. I do not know what the number is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what I thought.

Mr. KING. I will take the word of the Senator from Washington as the basis for my comment. Upon the basis of 131,000 this bill fixes a limit on the number of officers. It assumes an enlisted strength of 131,000 or a little over instead of 86,000, and you furnish officers for 131,000 in the Navy when we have only 86,000. The point which interested me was that the Senator from Virginia had been speaking about the reduction in officers in the various grades. I do not know whether there is very much reduction or not. Men were promoted upon the theory of maintaining the Navy at 131,000, and I presume they are keeping those grades, though we have reduced the number to 136,000. I suppose they would keep those grades, and have the same number of officers, if we reduced the number in the Navy to 25,000. I ask the Senator from Virginia if there is any doubt that if we reduced the number of the personnel to 50,000 the number of officers in the Navy would still be based upon a personnel of 136,000?

Mr. SWANSON. As I told the Senator, there has been a deficiency of officers in the Navy.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Washington says they have made provision in this bill for 5,000.

Mr. SWANSON. But there is a deficiency of about 1,200 officers in the Navy. I told the Senator that they had made provision to base the number of officers on the authorized strength, so that as the Navy expands they can take care of the expansion.

Mr. KING. I am simply trying to get some facts in regard to this matter, and I certainly hope that the learned Senators who are members of the Naval Affairs Committee, and have been for years, will not be too sparing in furnishing the facts, and will not be too critical of those who make inquiry to learn what the facts are. I protested, and have been protesting for some time, against the policy of the Navy and the policy of the Army of sending in names for promotion by the score, which have been brought before us in our executive sessions. They rush them in upon the theory that we are going to have an Army very much larger than we have and a Navy very much larger than we have.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want to prolong the debate, as far as any action of mine is concerned, but I would like to suggest to the Senator from Utah, and I believe he will agree with me if he looks at it from an impartial standpoint, aside from any interest he may have——

Mr. KING. In economy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That the most important thing in connection with the Navy, and the most difficult thing to attain, is a corps of highly trained, technically educated officers. I ask him if he does not agree with me that in the process of the reduction of the Navy upon some basis of economy and at the same time upon such a basis as would enable us to develop the Navy to meet any emergency—and, of course, that is what the Navy and the Army are kept for—it would be advisable to have a larger proportion of trained and educated officers, relatively, than of enlisted men, who can be trained in a much shorter space of time and prepared for service?

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the theory upon which we are proceeding, and I thought that the Senator would agree with me upon that policy.

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The actual number of officers in the Navy at the present time is only about 4,100. It is more than 1,000 below the authorized complement of line officers; but there is a new class graduating at the academy, and some addition has been made on that account in the computation of pay, but still it is not up to the complement which we are authorized to have upon the basis of 4 per cent of the authorized enlisted strength.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall have no quarrel with my good friend from Washington. I agree with him that both in the Army and the Navy there should be what might be called a reservoir from which we could draw our officers in the event of a naval war or a land war, or both. We ought to have more officers, relatively, than we now employ in the Army and in the Navy. I want to find the disproportion, because the Senator knows that I have objected repeatedly to the policy of both the Army and the Navy in making these constant advancements and promotions when it was known that there would be reductions, and we would have, as we have in the Army to-day, more captains, perhaps by 100 per cent, than there need be for the enlisted personnel, and the same with majors and the same with generals; and in the Navy we have been making rapid promotions. We have, perhaps, enough of the higher officers in the Navy to fill all positions if we had a Navy the enlisted personnel of which numbered two or three hundred thousand.

The question as to where the limit should rest, however, is one upon which there may be honest difference of opinion. If we are to reduce the Navy to 50,000 men, as I hope we may at the next session of Congress, are we to keep a commissioned personnel upon the theory that we are to have a Navy of 131,400 men? With respect to the Army, when we reduce it to 50,000 or 75,000 men, as we should, are we to proceed upon the theory that we are to have an Army of a quarter of a million, and have officers based upon that assumption? I am not speaking accurately with respect to those figures; I am just speaking by way of illustration. As I understood him, the Senator from Washington stated that provision was made for approximately 5,000 officers. If I am in error, I hope the Senator will correct me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will get the exact figures and submit them to the Senator. The number of officers we now have in the Navy is considerably below that, but we recently graduated over 500 new officers at the Naval Academy.

Mr. KING. Of course, this is what will happen. Those who are graduated will be moved up, and that will move others up, and so on, and at the top of the list we will have a number of admirals, based upon the theory that we have a Navy of 131,000 or more.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If there is any value in comparison with the practices of other nations, we would have a most pronounced discrepancy in the relative number of naval officers of high rank in our Navy. Japan and Great Britain, both of them great naval powers, and even France and Italy, which are minor naval powers, have a much greater proportion of admirals and officers of high rank than we have in our Navy.

Mr. KING. Be that as it may, Mr. President, it simply means that we will make permanent, upon the theory that we have a Navy of 131,400 men——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will give the Senator the exact figures. Four thousand four hundred and thirty-one is the number of officers used as a basis for computation of the amount of pay for the commissioned personnel in the bill.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understand the Senator now. Does the Senator mean that it is to be that number instead of the 5,000 he mentioned a moment ago?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then under the provisions of the bill, may I ask the Senator whether there will be no more officers than 4,431?

Mr. POINDEXTER. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] just suggested to me, that will be the average during the year, but it will be very little of the time during the year when it will come up to that number. It could not be more than that because there would not be money to pay them.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, in no event will the number of officers during the next year exceed 4,431.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. KING. Now, Mr. President, I have elicited what I wanted to elicit, namely, the strength of officers and the proportion which they bear to enlisted men. As I understand it now, we may have officers upon the basis of 131,400 enlisted men.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The figures I gave the Senator a moment ago, 5,280, approximately would be the authorized number, but we are not providing for the entire authorized number. Neither have we the authorized number in the Navy at the present time, and we could not have under the terms of the bill because of the lack of appropriations for them.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the Navy Department would have the authority to make promotions and increase the number of officers up to the authorized strength of 5,280?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Navy Department has no authority whatever to make any promotions.

Mr. KING. I mean recommendations, of course.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They can make recommendations, but the promotions and appointments have to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Is it the purpose of the Navy Department to make no further recommendations in excess of the limit of 4,431?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is undoubtedly the purpose, because they will have to confine themselves to the provision made for them in the bill.

Mr. KING. Unless they create a deficit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have no authority to create a deficit in pay.

Mr. KING. But we are so in the habit of having deficits that we would not be surprised if one came at any time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may we have action upon the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment inserting the proviso beginning in line 17, page 35.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 36, after line 13, to strike out the following additional provisos:

Provided further, That enlisted men of the Navy who would be eligible under existing law for transfer to the Fleet Naval Reserve after 16 years' service at the expiration of the current enlistment in which serving, or who have completed 16 years' service, may be transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve at any time after the passage of this act in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and shall, upon such transfer, receive the same pay and allowances as now authorized by law for men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve at the expiration of enlistment after 16 years' service: Provided further, That enlisted men of the Navy, who have completed 18 years' service, may be transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve at any time after the passage of this act in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and shall, upon such transfer, receive the same pay and allowances as now authorized by law for men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve after 20 years' service: Provided further, That enlisted men who have served for more than 12 but less than 16 years shall be permitted to reenlist and continue serving, unless sooner discharged by sentence of a court-martial, until they have completed 16 years' service, whereupon they shall, upon their own application, be permitted to transfer to the Fleet Naval Reserve: Provided further, That no enlisted men of the Navy shall be transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve unless they have completed 16 or 20 years' service after the Navy is reduced to the number of enlisted men appropriated for in this act, and in no event after January 1, 1923: Provided further, That the enlisted men who have served less than 12 years found to be in excess of the total number herein appropriated for, after all other deductions have been made by way of retirement or transfer, shall be discharged or furloughed without pay for the convenience of the Government, and all recruiting shall be discontinued until the total number of enlisted men has been reduced to the number herein appropriated for: Provided further, That enlisted men of the Navy who may be separated from the service by furlough or discharge under the requirements of this act shall receive travel allowance now authorized by law for men honorably discharged, and shall, upon reenlistment in the Navy at any time hereafter, receive the then current pay of the rating held at the time of discharge plus all permanent additions to such pay authorized by law at time of reenlistment for service equal to that which they had at time of discharge, and, if allowed to reenlist, shall be required to serve under such reenlistment only for a period equal to the unexpired term of the enlistment in which serving when furloughed or discharged.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington the reason for the elimination of that provision?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It involves a matter of policy and, being in the interest of a reduction of the retired list of the Navy or what is equivalent to the retired list, I hope the Senator from Utah will agree with the committee. I will explain in a few words the effect of it.

In 1916, at a time when the country was practically getting ready for war, we enacted a comprehensive and very liberal naval reserve act. In that act it was provided that enlisted men who had served for 16 years in the Navy might, if they chose, be transferred to what was called the fleet reserve, and upon that transfer receive pay for the balance of their lives at the rate of one-third of the base pay they were receiving at the time of the transfer.

It was also provided in the same act that men who had served for 20 years in the Navy, and who did not desire to retire when they had served 16 years and get one-third of their base pay, might at the end of the twentieth year be transferred to the fleet reserve and receive pay for the balance of their lives at the rate of one-half of the base pay, thereby establishing a great list of retired enlisted men, those enlisted men of course in almost all cases being of high enlisted rank, chief petty officers, many of whom were receiving pay at the rate of over $90 per month. So it meant an enormous expense and burden upon the Treasury.

We have not changed that law at all, but the proviso, which the committee proposes to strike out on pages 36, 37, and 38 of the bill, changes the law, the outlines of which I just stated to the Senate, and to liberalize it. It provides, in fact, that the men need not wait until they shall have served 16 years or 20 years in the Navy, but when they have served, say, for 12 years and then have reenlisted, if they determine to serve out that reenlistment at the end of which they would be entitled to transfer to the fleet reserve with the emoluments which I have described, they need not wait, as the proviso would provide, in effect, until the four years had expired, but should be transferred then and receive that pay for the balance of their lives.

It is objected on the part of some of the enlisted men that the proviso ought to be left in the bill, because to strike it out will be breaking faith with them; that it would deprive them of some of the benefits or emoluments which were the inducement for them to enlist and to serve during the time for which they have served. They are entirely mistaken in any such construction or in any such allegation. The striking out of the proviso would not change existing law and would not deprive them of any right or any emolument to which they were entitled at the time they enlisted or at any time during the period when they have been serving. It leaves them all their rights of transfer to the Fleet Reserve and to pay the same as was provided in the law of 1916.

Of course, the rate has been changed and increased to some extent in most cases by the service pay bill which was enacted and approved on the 10th day of this month.

I think that in substance states the situation. The conclusion of the committee was that, in a time when we are supposed to be endeavoring to get back to an economical basis in the establishment of the military branches of the Government, we ought not to be liberalizing and extending the provisions for putting upon the retired list young men who are able to continue in the active service of the Navy and serve out the period of time which under the law at the time they enlisted and during all the time of their service they were required to serve before they would have the right to retire from service and receive pay for the balance of their lives. The effect of it would be to cut down the appropriations in the bill to the amount of some $3,920,000.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, I entirely agree with the position of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I may say, in order not to mislead the Senator, that while it cuts down the appropriation in that amount it also increases the appropriation for pay of active service in the Navy, because these men, instead of being transferred to the inactive list, would remain upon the active list of the Navy, and the Navy would get the benefit of their services and would not have to pay them one-third or one-half of their pay, as the case may be, during a period of four years or two years in the different classes if this proviso were enacted.

Mr. KING. While they are in the active service it would seem to me there would be no necessity of recruiting or promoting to fill their positions. So, to that extent, the number would be diminished. As I understand the Senator, though, the former very liberal provisions for retirement and pension, which constitute, as the Senator said, such a heavy drain upon the Treasury, still remain in existence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The old provision still remains. I think, however, that very shortly there will be presented to the Congress a comprehensive bill for the reorganization of the Naval Reserve. Of course, in that measure, while we could, if we chose to do it, we probably ought not to deprive men who have earned any rights under the existing law of what they had earned, but we could provide a more economical basis for the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Provisions, Navy," on page 38, line 21, after the word "officers," to strike out "commuted rations for officers on sea duty (other than commissioned officers of the line, Medical and Supply Corps, chaplains, chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, chief machinists, chief pay clerks, and chief sailmakers)," so as to read:

For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes in case of death or desertion upon orders of the commanding officers, at 50 cents per diem, and midshipmen at 80 cents per diem, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 75 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 3, after the word "of," to strike out "officers and," so as to read:

subsistence of men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, in line 7, before the word "subsistence," to strike out "subsistence of men on detached duty," so as to read:

subsistence of officers and men of the naval auxiliary service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In connection with that amendment, it is desired to change the language in the House bill which is proposed to be stricken out and to insert in place of it, in line 7, page 39, the words "quarters and subsistence of men on detached duty." I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 11, after the word "subsistence," to insert "in kind," so as to read:

Expenses in handling provisions and for subsistence in kind of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$19,724,928" and insert "$16,663,305," so as to read:

In all, $16,663,305, to be available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, on account of an error in computation—and all of these matters, I will explain, depend upon the question of whether certain items shall be inserted under the head of "Pay of the Navy" or under the head of "Provisions, Navy," the uncertainty being caused by the change in the law enacted on the 10th of this month, which is known as the service pay bill—I move to amend the amendment just stated by substituting for the figures proposed to be inserted the figures "$19,499,355."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether there have been taken from some other place in the bill the three million and odd dollars by which he now proposes to increase the appropriation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 34 the amount of $2,836,050 was stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Maintenance," on page 40, at the end of line 23, to strike out "$7,069,260" and insert "$7,054,260," so as to read:

For fuel; the removal and transportation of ashes and garbage from ships of war; books, blanks, and stationery, including stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, chaplains on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ships; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters for ships; packing boxes and materials; interior fittings for general storehouses, pay offices, and accounting offices in navy yards; expenses of disbursing officers; coffee mills and repair thereto; expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for the same; laboratory equipment; purchase of articles of equipage at home and abroad under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith, and the manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; musical instruments and music; mess outfits; soap on board naval vessels; athletic outfits; tolls, ferriages, yeomen's stores, safes, and other incidental expenses; labor in general storehouses, paymasters' offices, and accounting offices in navy yards and naval stations, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased and manufactured under "the naval supply account fund"; and reimbursement to appropriations of the Department of Agriculture of cost of inspection of meats and meat food products for the Navy Department; in all, $7,054,260.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, so as to avoid consuming time when we return to the consideration of the bill for individual amendments, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether the committee investigated the limitation upon the item just referred to, which provides:

That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation—

That is, $7,069,260—

under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards and naval stations and disbursing offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $3,069,260.

Did the committee feel that the consumption of nearly half of the appropriation, indeed, of more than half of the appropriation, for clerical aid, for chemists and inspection and messenger service was warranted? It seems to me that that is an enormous amount to be used for the purposes indicated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The limitation placed upon that matter last year was $3,500,000. The principal part of the expense of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts under the head of "Maintenance" is the keeping of a vast number of accounts of the supplies of the Navy issued to each station and to each ship; and the amount limited in this proviso is the result of many years of experience. It has been reduced by the proviso below what it was last year by nearly one-half million dollars.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that for the coming year the Navy will be smaller than it was last year. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has investigated this matter and has had before him witnesses, and I have not had the advantage which the committee had; but when attention is directed to the bill we find under the heading "Maintenance" provision made "for fuel; the removal and transportation of ashes and garbage from ships of war; books, blanks, and stationery," and for many other items, including "expenses of disbursing officers; coffee mills and repair thereto; expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for the same; laboratory equipment; purchase of articles of equipage at home and abroad under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith, and the manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; musical instruments and music; mess outfits; soap on board naval vessels; athletic outfits; tolls, ferriages, yeomen's stores, safes, and other incidental expenses; labor in general storehouses, paymasters' offices," and many other items for which a total amount of $7,054,260 is appropriated. Then, to use $3,069,260 "for chemists and for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards and naval stations and disbursing offices," it would seem to the ordinary observer that the cost involved is entirely too great.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There may be some misapprehension about that. The items to which the Senator has referred may be very misleading. Some of them are used in a rather technical sense. The Senator realizes that these bills are framed in accordance with forms which have been in use from year to year. For instance, the item of fuel in line 24, on page 39, does not mean fuel for the Navy, but merely incidental fuel.

Mr. KING. There is another appropriation for fuel for the Navy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is another appropriation for fuel for the Navy. As a matter of fact, there is not an individual item in the long list which the Senator has read that is of substantial importance as compared with the one item upon which this limitation is placed, that of clerical service. The principal expense and principal activity for which the entire appropriation is made is the maintenance of the great force of office men who keep the accounts and have charge of the disbursements and the distribution of the money and of the supplies and provisions of various kinds in the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator knows that under various other headings provision is made for a very large clerical force in addition to the clerical force referred to here; in other words, that the only clerical force for the Navy is not that which is carried in the proviso now under consideration, for that seems to be only one of the numerous clerical forces provided for. Does the Senator know how many employees there are who would come under the head of clerical force and inspection and messenger service provided for out of the $3,069,260?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The total is 2,697.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Bringing home remains of officers, etc.," on page 44, after line 15, to strike out:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transferred to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, of members of the Nurse Corps, of civilian officers and crews of naval auxiliaries, and of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers and the Naval Reserve Force when on active service with the Navy, who die or are killed in action ashore or afloat, and also to enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of civilian employees who die outside of the continental limits of the United States, $65,000: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall be available for payment for transportation of the remains of officers and men who have died while on duty at any time since April 21, 1898.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Not exceeding $65,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation "Bringing home remains, etc., Navy Department, 1921–22," contained in the naval appropriation act approved June 4, 1920, is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the same purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 4, after the word "walls," to insert "and maintenance dredging," so as to read:

Navy yard, Mare Island, Calif.: Rebuilding dikes, wharves, and quay walls, and maintenance dredging.

Mr. KING. I should like to make an inquiry in regard to that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say to the Senator from Utah it is agreeable to those of us interested in the matter that the words "and maintenance and dredging" should be inserted there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same line, after the word "dredging," to strike out "(limit of cost $2,800,000), $750,000, to be available immediately" and insert "$250,000."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be disagreed to. There have been some differences concerncerning this item, but those differences have been composed, and it is agreed that the committee will accept the language of the House text with a reduction from $750,000 to $500,000, and that the committee amendment inserting "$250,000," in line 6, will not be agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding was that the Senator from California would propose an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; that is quite so. The amendment which I desire to offer is, as I have stated, to strike out "$750,000," in line 6, and insert "$500,000," and the remainder of the House text will then stay in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KING. Let it be stated as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "$750,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$500,000," and then to disagree to the amendment of the committee, so that it will read:

Navy Yard, Mare Island, Calif.: Rebuilding dikes, wharves, and quay walls, and maintenance dredging (limit of cost $2,800,000), $500,000, to be available immediately.

Mr. KING. And a period there.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. And a period.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And strike out "$250,000."

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; then the "$250,000" in line 6 will be stricken out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, upon that I desire to make just a brief comment. It has been a matter of considerable difficulty with the committee; and in that connection I want to file as a part of my remarks, and have printed in the RECORD, a statement from the Acting Secretary of the Navy showing the depth of water in front of the Mare Island yard and in the approaches to it, and showing the draft of the battleships of the fleet of the United States as specified in the naval limitation treaty, of which about 12 of the largest are now on the Pacific coast.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 14, 1922.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the telephonic message from your office of June 12, 1922, requesting a written statement giving the exact draft of the 18 battleships allowed the United States by the treaty for the limitation of armament, when fully equipped, including armament, and also a statement as to the depth of water at and going to the United States navy yard, Mare Island, Calif., I beg to inform you as follows:

Name of ship.	Full load.
	Displacement.	Draft aft.
	Tons.	Ft. in.
Arizona	32,567	29 10
Arkansas	27,243	29 7
California	33,190	31 0
Delaware	22,960	28 10
Florida	23,033	30 1
Idaho	33,000	31 ½
Maryland	33,390	31 3½
Mississippi	33,000	31 ½
Nevada	28,400	29 7
New Mexico	33,000	31 ½
New York	28,367	29 7
North Dakota	22,960	28 10
Oklahoma	28,400	29 7½
Pennsylvania	32,567	29 10
Tennessee	33,190	31 0
Texas	28,367	29 7
Utah	23,033	30 1
Wyoming	27,243	29 7

With regard to the depth of water at and going to Mare Island, the latest information in the possession of the department is a telegram from the commandant at Mare Island, dated May 6, 1922, from which the following is quoted:

"Based on above, commandant considers limiting draft of water vessel under her own steam can be carried from San Francisco to yard water front is 28 feet 6 inches under present conditions. When dredging referred to above completed (September 1, 1922), 30 feet 6 inches."

In connection with the draft of battleships and the depth and character of the bottom of certain channels, all battleships of the New Mexico class and subsequent battleships have a peculiarity in that the condenser intake pipes take from the bottom of the ship instead of part way up the side, as in previous classes of ships. The result is that in a channel the bottom of which is mainly silt it is a simple matter to plug one or both of the main condensers, thereby stopping one or both engines. If the channel is short, the difficulty is usually only temporary. Another matter to be considered always, Is the vessel in a damaged condition? After the Battle of Jutland the battleship Marlborough sent a radio to the effect that her draft on arrival would be 40 feet.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am only putting this in the RECORD so that it may be available for information about a matter which seems to have been the subject of a great difference of opinion and a great deal of dispute, as to the accessibility of the Mare Island yard for the larger battleships of the Navy with their armor and armament aboard.

This yard has been an extremely valuable and serviceable yard; and, if I may make a personal reference, I believe that I took quite a material part a year ago in stopping the movement which apparently, so far as the Senate committee action was concerned, would have led to the permanent abandonment of this yard. I was opposed to that, and I am opposed to it now. The only question with the committee was as to the desirability of the expenditure in one year of the amount of money provided in the House bill for repairs, or whether the work could be more economically distributed over a number of years.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has proposed a compromise which is favorable to him and to the yard, and yet I think, in the interest of economy and upon conference with my colleagues on the committee, we have accepted it.

I want to call attention, chiefly for the purpose of use in connection with other problems that will come up in regard to naval bases on the Pacific, to the statement which I have, dated the 14th of June, from the department, as follows:

With regard to the depth of water at and going to Mare Island, the latest information in the possession of the department is a telegram from the commandant at Mare Island, dated May 6, 1922, from which the following is quoted:

"Based on above, commandant considers limiting draft of water vessel under her own steam can be carried from San Francisco to yard water front is 28 feet 6 inches under present conditions. When dredging referred to above completed (September 1, 1922) 30 feet 6 inches."

That is, that when the present plan of dredging is completed on September 1, 1922, it is the opinion of the commandant of the yard that vessels drawing 30 feet 6 inches can be brought to the yard.

In the tabulated statement, also of immediate recent date, which I have referred to as to the draft of water of the battleship fleet, there is contained the California, of 31 feet draft; so that there would evidently be some difficulty, at least, in getting the California, of 31 feet draft, to the Mare Island Navy Yard, if we are to be guided by the statement of the commandant of the yard that the limit of draft of a vessel which can be brought there is 30 feet and 6 inches. The draft of the California is half a foot more than that; consequently the keel of that vessel would be half a foot in the mud. The Idaho has a draft of 31 feet and one-half inch; the Maryland, 31 feet 3½ inches; the Mississippi, 31 feet and one-half inch; the New Mexico, 31 feet and one-half inch. So that those great vessels of our fleet which are on the Pacific, Mr. President, apparently will not be able to be brought into this yard, certainly without extraordinary dredging.

I am informed on very good authority that when the California—which was built at the Mare Island Navy Yard—was launched it took a period of about two months of special dredging to get her out. I state this only upon information, but upon such information that I can not doubt it. It is true that she had her armor and armament aboard, but if it took two months of special dredging to get the California out, it would take two months of special dredging to get her in, or any other ship of that class.

I am not saying this in any spirit of hostility or prejudice to the Mare Island Yard, because I have demonstrated my friendliness for that yard, which is one of the only two yards that we have upon the Pacific coast, where the chief center of naval interest and of naval importance lies, now and in the future. The Mare Island Navy Yard has served a most useful purpose as a construction yard, because ships the names of which I have here—and which it is not necessary to give unless some Senator desires them—have been constructed there, and have been taken out under light draft without their equipment. We are, however, confronted with a problem, in estimating the future importance of this yard, as to what uses it is to be put to, and there is no doubt that there are uses to which it can be put; and in the consideration of that problem we must take into consideration the fact that the great services that this yard has rendered as a construction yard for capital ships of the Navy will be no longer available, at least for a period of 10 years, under the treaty which has been negotiated and ratified by the Senate. There are, however, other uses to which this yard can be put. It can be the base for smaller vessels, perhaps even some of the smaller battleships of the Navy, at which they can find repairs and supplies. Some $30,000,000 has been invested there. To be sure, it is hard to be called on to authorize the expenditure of $2,800,000 merely for repairs or replacements. Of course, nobody is responsible for the work of the teredo, but it makes no difference what the origin of the difficulty was; the result is that we are called upon to authorize this expenditure and to make this appropriation merely to maintain what we have already had at this yard. Great as the amount is, however, notwithstanding the fact that we will get from it no advancement, no improvement, no progress, but merely hold what we formerly had, and replace it, I hope, upon a more permanent basis, with a more durable structure than was the case when it was first constructed, I have come to the conclusion upon mature consideration that we should make the expenditure and maintain the yard for such purposes as it may be available for.

I have here a statement from the commandant of the yard in which he says that with the $250,000 that was allowed by the Senate committee, the most vital part of the quay wall—where, I understand, the damage is so great that some of the buildings are beginning to fall down, or threatening to fall down—could be repaired, and that one of the dikes, as they are called, or jetties at the mouth of the entrance to the navy-yard waters, could be repaired; that those two improvements could be made out of the $250,000. With the $500,000 which we agree to, of course double the amount of that work can be done. I trust that a great part of it will be done by the employees of the yard, so that they may be taken care of during the period of demobilization, and so that we may cause as little distress there as possible and utilize this work as a means of holding together the yard organization.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have no objection, of course, to the printing in the RECORD of the document that has been referred to by the Senator from Washington. I want to emphasize, however, that this item does not deal with a naval base in the State of California, nor does it have to do with the establishment of any other institution or organization there at all. The item is essential as written by the House because of unforeseen damage that has been done to the various dikes and the various sea walls surrounding Mare Island; and if this damage be not repaired, that which the Government possesses, as is said by the Senator from Washington, an investment of more than $30,000,000, will probably be irreparably damaged.

Mr. President, I would not wish, from the remarks of the Senator from Washington, either the services or the activities or the efficiency of Mare Island Navy Yard to be underestimated or misunderstood at all. It happens that one of the most efficient navy yards in the United States is this one situated at Mare Island. It happens, too, that during the war it demonstrated that efficiency, and I can recall very well a year or two ago seeing the pride with which the men who worked at Mare Island regarded the banner that was accorded them from the United States Government because they were first in efficiency in the great work done during the war.

It happens, too, Mr. President, that Mare Island does more work for the United States Navy—and this would never be apparent from the remarks of the Senator from Washington—than any other navy yard in the United States save the New York yard, and the New York yard exceeds it in the work it does solely because in that navy yard clothing is manufactured, and clothing is not manufactured at Mare Island.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the draft of the water in the channel at Mare Island. That is a matter for determination when the question may ultimately arise as to whether or not we desire another naval base on the Pacific coast. But the preservation of this navy yard, the largest on the Pacific coast, perhaps the most efficient in the United States, actually doing more work than any other navy yard in the Navy line in the United States, is at this time of the utmost importance.

Any man in this country with vision, any individual who will not shut his eyes to passing events, will realize that the future, after all, will be unfolded in the Pacific Ocean; that, after all, perhaps not during the life of the Senator from Washington and myself, but certainly during the lives of our immediate descendants, world activity will be in the Pacific.

I am not one of those who, ostrichlike, buries his head in the quicksands of a conference and believes that thereafter nothing can occur at all. I believe that where there is an efficient yard like this, and where there is a necessity for the maintenance of an efficient yard like this, requisite appropriations should be accorded it, not in any spirit of truculence at all but in the spirit that we ought to be ready to do that which is prudent and essential, even under a disarmament conference or a naval limitation holiday.

This navy yard represents, after all, the outlook of the United States upon the Pacific Ocean. With the exception of the one situated in Washington, which I grant is a very excellent one and a most efficient one, but not as large, nor, indeed, as well equipped as Mare Island, Mare Island represents in this great New World activity the United States of America, and it ought to be preserved.

It is not preserved by the House in this provision upon the theory which is suggested here, the consideration of the depth of the water and the like—these are matters extraneous to the present question—but because it has done the job in the past, and, just exactly as it has done the job in the past, when the Navy required it, it can do the job in the future, if we have sufficient foresight to take care of it in these appropriations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not entirely satisfied with the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] which deals with the navy yard at Mare Island. Yesterday an agreement was made between members of the committee having this bill in charge and the Senator from California and others interested in the navy yard at Mare Island which contemplated the adoption of the amendment just reported. I assented to the arrangement and, of course, support it. I concluded to make no observations in regard to this item but to accept the amendment and pass to other features of the bill without further delay. I would not now occupy the time of the Senate except for the statements made by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the tables and figures which he has put into the RECORD which seem to disparage Mare Island as a naval base.

It was my opinion that the appropriation carried in the House bill was necessary and that it was unwise to reduce the current appropriation to $250,000. Senators, I am sure, will concede that, in view of my attitude toward appropriations and my objections to what I have conceived to be extravagant and improper appropriations, there must be some cogent reason to induce me to support an increase in a provision carrying an appropriation.

The House committee which prepared the naval appropriation bill were familiar with the navy yard at Mare Island and examined with more or less care its present condition and requirements and reached the conclusion, as I interpret their action, that the Mare Island Navy Yard should be maintained and, indeed, expanded, and that adequate appropriations should be made to keep it in an efficient and up-to-date condition.

The Senate committee reported an amendment to the House bill, which, if I understand it, is a challenge to any plan which contemplates the maintenance of the Mare Island Navy Yard as an important naval base; indeed, it appears from the amendment that the purpose was to so cripple the navy yard that it would soon be unsuitable and inadequate for the uses to which it has been put in the past or of any particular value in the future, thus furnishing an excuse for the establishment of another naval base at some other point in San Francisco Bay, presumably Alameda, at a cost to the Government of tens of millions of dollars.

This action of the committee I regarded as unwise, and I felt that a fight should be made to restore the House provision and settle once for all the question of the permanency of the Mare Island Navy Yard. Accordingly I insisted that the entire appropriation carried in the House bill should be accepted by the Senate and that the words "limit of cost, $2,800,000" should be retained.

The understanding reached yesterday between the committee and the senior Senator from California and one of the Representatives from California [Mr. CURRY] called for the restoration of the entire amendment stricken out by the Senate committee, but it involved a reduction of $250,000 in the appropriation to be immediately available. Of course I do not desire to go counter to the position taken by the distinguished gentlemen referred to, and particularly in view of the fact that the provision of the bill is retained, which indicates that there will be expended the necessary sum of $2,800,000 to rebuild the dikes, wharves, and quay walls, and for maintenance and dredging purposes at the navy yard. This amendment is a victory for Mare Island and commits the Government to the policy of maintaining it as a naval base, and calls for an expenditure of $2,800,000 for the purposes just stated.

Let me add that the expenditure of the greater part of this sum has been made necessary because of the ravages of the teredo, that destructive pest which burrows into the wooden piles and wooden structures beneath the surface of the water and renders them valueless. Senators know that wharves of the value of millions of dollars have been destroyed in various harbors by this pest, and I am told that many of the wharves and piers in various parts of San Francisco Bay have within the past year suffered in the same manner. Private corporations and shipping companies are now compelled to rebuild their wharves and piers in various parts of San Francisco Bay at a cost of millions of dollars.

The Mare Island piers and wharves were not immune from the ravages of this animal and, of course, if Mare Island is to be maintained, repairs and renewals must immediately be made. If I have correctly interpreted the position of the able Senator from Washington, he assents to the appropriation asked for and carried in the modified amendment just offered by the Senator from California, but entertains doubts as to the wisdom of maintaining Mare Island as an important naval base in the San Francisco Bay. And if I rightly understood the position of the junior Senator from California, I am not in accord with him. I stand unqualifiedly for Mare Island as a permanent major naval base, and I regard this appropriation as an indication of the purpose of the Government to maintain it as such.

The figures placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Washington do not, in my opinion, accurately reflect the true condition. The facts, as I understand them, do not justify the conclusion that Mare Island is not a suitable place for a major naval base adequate for all purposes for which such naval base may be required in California waters. In other words, the facts, to my mind, demonstrate the availability of Mare Island for a base of this character. They not only demonstrate its availability but prove its superiority for such purposes. I concede there are some disadvantages and some objections, but when they are balanced against the advantages, the superiorities and all other factors which have been or should be taken into account in passing upon the question, I unhesitatingly state that the Government should not only maintain the present navy yard at Mare Island, but it should, at the southern extremity of the island, construct one or more docks, also berthing piers for the largest naval vessels, and make other improvements connecting the present yard and plant with such docks and piers.

I not only do not deny, but indeed I contend that there should be in San Francisco Bay a major naval base, including suitable docks. My opposition to the expenditure of a hundred millions of dollars or any sum at Alameda does not rest upon the ground that a major naval base is not required in the waters of the bay; upon the contrary, I have for years believed that the United States should have a modern up-to-date and highly developed naval base in San Francisco Bay; one that would be suitable for the small as well as the large naval craft that must require a base or home waters from which they may radiate.

For several years I have given considerable attention to the question of the establishment of a major naval base in California waters. I have studied the situation at Mare Island, have conferred with numerous experts and officials, and have read all naval reports and the testimony given before various naval committees and subcommittees relating to the subject, and have sought every available source of information in order that I might, so far as was within my power, reach a right conclusion.

After full investigation I became convinced that it was unwise for the Government to scrap Mare Island and to establish a naval base at Alameda or at any other point in San Francisco Bay. I became convinced that it was unwise to establish two naval bases in the waters of San Francisco Bay. The objections which were urged against Mare Island I have canvassed as thoroughly as it was possible and have become satisfied that they are more formidable to the superficial observer than to the honest investigator who becomes conversant with all the facts. Indeed, I am satisfied that most of the objections are intangible and that some, though apparently of weight and merit, lose much of their potency when carefully analyzed. And I insist that if the physical objections urged are conceded they constitute less valid and substantial reasons for the establishment of a major naval base at Mare Island than are the multitudinous ones which exist and which must be weighed in considering the propriety of establishing such a base at any other point in the bay.

Mr. President, before I became a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate I had been brought within the range of what might be properly called propaganda against Mare Island, and I approached the subject with more or less prejudice because of the objections which had been urged to the maintenance of Mare Island as a navy yard or expanding it into a major naval base. I discovered what I believed to be a feeling upon the part of certain naval officers to discredit Mare Island and to secure an enormous appropriation for the purpose of building a naval base nearer the city of San Francisco. That there were numerous influences at work to bring about this result was quite apparent. Of course, I make no complaint because of the desire of the people of San Francisco or Oakland, or those residing along the shores of the lower San Francisco Bay, to bring about the expenditure of $75,000,000 to $100,000,000, to be taken from the Federal Treasury, in the establishment of a naval base in close proximity to their homes. Undoubtedly the expenditure of this vast sum would prove of advantage to the business interests in the vicinity. I found no fault with the zeal and energy and enthusiasm of the people of Oakland and Alameda in attempting to secure an initial appropriation for the acquisition and reclamation of swamp lands known as the Alameda naval site, where it was hoped a naval base would be established at a cost of upward of $50,000,000.

I have no doubt that officers of the Navy as well as others have been sincere in their advocacy of the abandonment of Mare Island and the establishment of a naval base at Alameda; but I have no doubt that some were influenced by selfish views; others by various considerations extraneous to those which should be controlling in the selection of a modern naval base and in determining a matter so important to the Government as that involved in establishing a great naval base upon the Pacific coast. It is my opinion also that some were misled by the inaccurate statements given out by the propagandists who were urging Hunters Point or the Alameda site, or some other point in the lower San Francisco Bay. The propaganda carried on against Mare Island has been extensive and intensive, and the pressure brought upon Congress to locate a naval base upon the Alameda site has been continuous and potent. Representatives from commercial organizations have visited Washington, and powerful influences have been exerted to secure appropriations for Alameda or some site near San Francisco.

After becoming a member of the Naval Affairs Committee I sought to learn the facts in order that I might vote intelligently and fairly upon the questions that might arise relating to the establishment of a naval base in the San Francisco Bay. As stated, I made as thorough an investigation as I could, and finally reached the conclusion that the propaganda against Mare Island was misleading, much of it untrue, and all directed toward securing tens of millions of dollars from the Treasury to establish another navy yard and a great naval base at a point close to San Francisco. As a result of my investigations I believe that it was unwise to establish a naval base at Alameda or Hunters Point, and that the best interests of the Government and the Navy would be served by maintaining at a high state of efficiency the navy yard at Mare Island and adding improvements in the shape of docks and berthing space, and mechanical appliances, and additional equipment, to the end that it might accommodate the needs of our naval craft in the Pacific waters.

Let me briefly state some of the facts which came to my attention: The Mare Island Navy Yard, as Senators know, is owned by the Government and is located on what is known as Mare Island. In 1854 Admiral Farragut, who was familiar with the bay and whose naval genius all gladly pay tribute to, selected Mare Island as a suitable, if not the most suitable, site in the San Francisco Bay for a naval yard, and, indeed, a naval base. Following his selection a naval station was established, and later a great navy yard was built.

The Government has expended more than $35,000,000 in the construction and development of this great plant. It has been constructed in what might be denominated a scientific and utilitarian manner. The factors to be considered in the construction of a great naval yard have been fully recognized, and they are exemplified in this modern and highly developed and efficient yard. The technique of plant construction has been scrupulously adhered to. The needs and wants of a great plant have been considered, as a result of which the Mare Island yard is perhaps the best equipped, the best constructed, and the most efficient of any navy yard in the United States. Indeed, some contend that it can not be surpassed in the world. Some of the ablest engineers in the Navy, if not in the world, have been employed at Mare Island, and their genius and skill and scientific knowledge have contributed to the efficient and perfectly developed yard and plant there found. It should be added that the plant and the yard do not belong to the mushroom category, but have been developed conservatively and in conformity with the best thought of naval constructors and naval plant builders. The machinery is of the highest grade, the appliances are modern, the buildings substantial and suitable, the arrangement of the yards conducive to the greatest efficiency and utility, the surroundings and approaches eminently satisfactory, and the general conditions much superior to those to be found in any other naval yard, existent or prospective.

Naval vessels of every type, from the naval cutter to the superdreadnought, are built at this navy yard, and, as I am advised, the costs are less than at any other yard, public or private, in the United States. The Navy Department awarded to the Mare Island yard the prize or banner provided for the most efficient navy yard operating during the war, and my information is that the highest efficiency rating was accorded to this plant, no other navy yard in the United States approaching it.

It is a truism that the highest efficiency and the best results industrially are found where the employees are happy and contented and where they feel that they are justly and fairly treated and their labors adequately appreciated and rewarded. Perhaps in no other plant in the United States has there been such peace and hearty cooperation among all the employees, including the supervising and directing forces. The city of Vallejo, lying across the channel from the plant, is the home of the thousands of employees who have given such distinction to Mare Island Navy Yard.

The mayor of this city where the employees live was for years a worker in the yard, and substantially the entire city is owned by the employees and former employees of the navy yard. The employees have comfortable and commodious homes; they have pride in their homes and this city, which is modern, sanitary, orderly, and in every way worthy of the highest traditions of the American people. It has splendid schools, well-kept streets, suitable parks, a fine water system, beautiful gardens, and those concomitants found in a progressive Christian community.

I made inquiry and discovered that there had been no labor troubles, no strikes, and none of those vexing industrial controversies now becoming so common in our land. The reason for peace and contentment is found in the fact that fair wages have been paid, most of the employees own their own homes, and they have lived in an enlightened and progressive atmosphere. Their sons, upon completing their education, have taken employment in the yard and have trained themselves to be skillful and efficient employees of our great Government. The conditions there prevailing, the material, educational, and moral surroundings are such as to develop an intelligent, home-loving, and patriotic community. It is because of the fine qualities of this splendid community that the fame of the Mare Island Navy Yard has spread throughout the United States and the accomplishments at the navy yard have been of such a high order.

Great credit is due for the superb work performed at this navy yard to some of the excellent naval officers who have held positions of responsibility from time to time. There have been those who went there as scoffers, but when they perceived the advantages of Mare Island, the fine modern plant, the character of the employees, the physical advantages, and many other factors that must be considered in weighing the suitability of a good site for an extensive naval plant or naval base, they became converts to what I might call the Mare Island cause, and earnest supporters of a governmental policy calling for the maintenance of Mare Island and its development into a larger, as well as into a permanent naval base.

Undoubtedly the fine record made at Mare Island in the construction and repair of naval vessels contributed to the movement which has sought to cripple, if not destroy, the navy yard, and to immediately reduce it to an unimportant repair yard for the smallest naval craft.

I have never looked with particular favor upon the Government engaging in business enterprises which belong to the field of private endeavor, and I have generally opposed the Government entering into competition with private concerns in what might be considered private enterprise. Of course, there is certain work which the Government with propriety may perform. Much may be said against the Government using the taxpayers' money to engage in business activities in competition with individuals. However, there are strong arguments in favor of the Government constructing guns for its battleships and perhaps for constructing some of its naval craft. In my opinion it is necessary for the Government to maintain navy yards for repair work, and I believe that there are advantages flowing from the maintenance of one or more naval bases upon such a scale and possessing such plants and equipment so that the Government if it desires may build naval craft. In other words, it may be prudent for the Government to have yards so constructed and equipped as that if necessary battleships and other forms of naval craft may be constructed by the Government itself. There have been instances where private contractors in making munitions and constructing military implements and war vessels have not treated the Government justly, but have imposed terms that many have believed extortionate.

However, without arguing this question, the facts compel the admission that at Mare Island naval craft were constructed cheaper than the prices submitted by private concerns, and the vessels built were in many respects superior not only in workmanship but in other important respects.

My recollection is that some of the officers and employees at the Mare Island plant a number of years ago brought to the attention of the country the advantages of the navy yard and its facilities for the construction of all kinds of naval vessels. It was also contended by them that they could do better work and at lower prices than could any private yard in the United States. Undoubtedly such a challenge was calculated to provoke the opposition, if not antagonism, of private yards, which had enjoyed more or less of a monopoly in the building of war vessels. My recollection is that the Mare Island yard was permitted to bid for the construction of war vessels and in many instances it was successful. Moreover, the competition thus developed resulted in a material reduction in the cost of vessels required by our Government.

The successes of the navy yard at Mare Island have brought it enemies as well as friends. It has had opponents, and still has, in the Navy Department, but I believe that those who are fully acquainted with all the facts are discovering that it would be a mistake to abandon the Mare Island Navy Yard or to reduce it to an unimportant repair plant, and that it would be extravagant and wholly unwarranted to establish a construction naval base or a repair naval base at any other point in the San Francisco Bay. I concede there have been adverse reports and recommendations that would, if carried into effect, reduce Mare Island to an unimportant position, and, as I interpret some of the recommendations, eventually lead to its demolition.

In 1916 the department appointed what was known as the Helm Board to investigate the question of naval bases on the Pacific coast. This board reported, in effect, that the development of a great naval base at the Mare Island Navy Yard was impossible because deep-draft vessels would be unable to enter the yard. In 1919 the Parks-McKean Board was appointed to investigate and report upon the same matter. Their only criticism of Mare Island's availability as a naval base rests upon what the board believed to be the lack of requisite depth in the channel approach to the navy yard. A special joint congressional committee, appointed in 1920, visited the Pacific coast, and after taking some testimony submitted a report to Congress. As I understand this report, the only objection urged against Mare Island, called by some the "Carquinez Strait site," as the location for a naval base rested upon the objection offered by the General Board of the Navy, namely, "That it is located on a shallow and muddy estuary, reached by an approach channel several miles long, through Pinole Shoals, making access difficult."

It will be perceived that all objections found as a result of these investigations relate to the approach channel to the navy yard and the alleged shallowness of the channel, through what is known as the Pinole Shoals.

Mr. President, I submit that the investigations were somewhat superficial. Certainly they were not thorough and exhaustive, and an impartial examination of the testimony taken at the various hearings will not support the conclusions announced by the two boards, above referred to, and the joint committee of which I have spoken.

First, let me state that the principal reason for the investigations related to naval requirements on the Pacific coast for additional docking and storage facilities, particularly in San Francisco Bay. Numerous sites, as the record discloses, were investigated, but finally all were eliminated except Mare Island (Carquinez Strait), Hunters Point, and Alameda. Senators who are familiar with San Francisco Bay will recall that Hunters Point is on the San Francisco side and near the city. The Alameda site is across the bay and adjoins the city of Oakland. Mare Island is some distance to the north, and is located upon what is called Carquinez Strait. The joint congressional committee recommended the establishment of a base at Alameda. I am not quite certain how far the committee intended to go in its recommendation. I do not believe that all members of the committee intended to recommend the establishment of a major naval base upon the mud flats adjoining Alameda at a cost of from fifty to seventy-five or one hundred millions of dollars. And yet, if Mare Island were to be abandoned and a major naval base established at the point indicated, it would involve an expenditure of from seventy-five to one hundred millions of dollars. At any rate, the report of the committee, as well as the unsatisfactory reports and investigations of the Helm Board and the Parks-McKean Board, were not convincing to the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, who promptly refused to carry out any of the recommendations with respect to Alameda.

When the matter came to the Senate, more than a year ago, efforts were made to secure an appropriation for the acquisition of the mud flats known as the Alameda site, but the Senate refused to make any appropriation for such purpose. Congress was literally besieged for weeks, if not months, by emissaries of those who were seeking to destroy the Mare Island Navy Yard and to build up an enormous naval base at Alameda.

As I have heretofore stated, representatives of civic organizations appeared, and an extensive propaganda was carried on to secure an initial appropriation for the so-called Alameda naval base site. It was urged, when it became apparent that Congress was averse to scrapping Mare Island Navy Yard, which had cost the Government more than $35,000,000, that if the swamps and mud flats at Alameda were acquired by the Government only a supply base would be constructed, at least for the present, and that possibly in the future, after further investigations were made, it might be deemed for the best interests of the Government to construct a dry dock and another naval plant upon the Alameda site.

The Senate was urged to appropriate a sum in excess of a million dollars merely for "initial purposes," but, as stated, this bill was rejected and the propagandists and real-estate agents from the Pacific coast made their exit, at least temporarily, from the Capitol. But they never abandoned their purpose to cripple or destroy the Mare Island yard and to construct a major naval base at Alameda. Because of the ignominious defeat suffered when the last naval appropriation bill was under consideration, the enemies of Mare Island have been more furtive, less open, but, as I believe, as determined and implacable as ever. Their past discomfiture may only intensify their animosity and increase in the future their zeal to accomplish their purpose.

I have no interest in this matter other than that of any public servant. I have many friends and acquaintances in San Francisco and in Oakland. I have but two or three acquaintances at Vallejo or Mare Island. I have opposed the attitude of some of the naval officers and the efforts to scrap the Mare Island yard and to spend one hundred millions in the bullrushes and mud flats of Alameda because I believed that it was not only unwise but that it was a foolish, extravagant, and improper project, which would waste millions of dollars. I believe that the objections urged against Mare Island are untenable and in part the result of prejudice and misinformation. I have opposed and still oppose the maintenance of two bases in San Francisco Bay or the establishment or maintenance of two yards or plants for the repair or for the construction of naval craft. I believe that the best interest of the Government will be served if Mare Island shall be expanded and made the major naval base in San Francisco Bay. If a few millions were expended at Alameda and the Government assented to a plant or base of any sort at that point, the agitation would persist and the pressure increase until larger sums would be appropriated and a larger plant constructed and a more extensive base developed. There would be rivalry between the Mare Island yard and the Alameda plant or base. The expense of maintaining two naval bases would become more and more apparent and the unwisdom of having two large plants in such close proximity would eventuate in the development of a sentiment which would destroy one, either the Mare Island yard or the Alameda base.

As stated, one or more of our largest war vessels have been at the Mare Island yards. If the channel is not deep enough or wide enough, there are no obstacles to prevent greater width or greater depth. I repeat, it is folly to talk of two naval bases in the San Francisco Bay. Mare Island must be maintained and enlarged or abandoned. Those who are fighting for the mud flats and the sloughs of Alameda know that they could not succeed if their full purpose was made known to Congress and to the country. Their purpose, of course, as I have stated, is to destroy the Mare Island yard and to construct at an enormous cost a naval base, including yards and docks, upon the Alameda site. They talk sweetly and gently about the Mare Island yard and deny any purpose to scrap it, although they insist that it can not be used for docking purposes or the repair of large naval craft and as a storage and supply base. They seek to placate by asking for a small appropriation for the present, and indicating that a supply base is all that need be constructed in the immediate future. Of course, it is camouflage. If the camel puts its head into the tent, it will, if possible, force its body through the aperture. The overhead of two naval bases would be enormous, and the maintenance of two yards, as I have stated, in San Francisco Bay would not be tolerated. I submit that it is either Mare Island or the mud flats of Alameda. There can not be two bases; there can not be two navy yards; there is no middle ground; there can be no compromise.

The able Senator from Washington has just remarked that a naval base can not be established at Mare Island, owing to the lack of depth in its approaches. In my opinion, the able Senator is undoubtedly mistaken and his informants have not presented all the facts. Some of the naval officers who are urging the Alameda project are ignorant of conditions at Mare Island or the plans which have been formulated by able engineers to bring Mare Island up to the standard required of the most important naval bases. It must be remembered that it is only within the past few years that the importance of dry docks in the San Francisco Harbor has been fully appreciated, and it will be remembered that only recently the naval situation as affecting the United States and the world has called for the maintenance of a large part of our fleet in the waters of the Pacific. Because Mare Island has not been developed to the standard referred to is no argument against its immediate development. The amount required to construct an additional dock and berthing places and to dredge the channel so as to meet every requirement is comparatively small. A few millions will convert this important navy yard into a major naval base, perhaps superior to any in the United States. The Senator indicates that the channel leading to Mare Island was so narrow and shallow that after the California, one of our great naval vessels, was constructed it was necessary to dredge for weeks to get the vessel into the lower bay and into the sea.

Mr. President, the Senator is in error and his informer or informants do the Senator and the Senate a great injustice. I submit a night letter from Rear Admiral Josiah S. McKean in regard to the trip of the California from Mare Island to the lower bay, and a letter from Capt. Henry M. Gleason, retired, who for 10 years was construction officer at Mare Island and who supervised the building of this great battleship and who writes concerning its launching.

Mr. President, I ask that I may insert the telegram in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KING. The telegram is as follows:

[Western Union telegram, night letter.]

MARE ISLAND, CALIF., June 13, 1922.

HON. C. F. CURRY, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

California's first trip to Hunters Point November 29, 1920, was for routine docking for preservation of hull one year after launching. Our dock too small for California. No difficulties encountered. Draft of vessel 23 feet 7 inches forward, 28 feet 9 inches aft on outgoing trip and 26 feet 3 inches forward, 28 feet 8 inches aft on return trip. Took advantage of this trip to examine propeller shafts on which propellers had not yet been installed and to prepare certain underwater fixtures for future work.

While moving vessel for yard purposes at a later date California broke loose from securing lines and made two complete turns in channel before she could be stopped and secured. No damage. Before final departure ship was again turned in Mare Island Straits. California's second trip to Hunters Point was after commissioning and when ready to proceed to lower bay, where she was to be docked again for routine work and for installation of propellers, and was towed down channel without incident on August 20, 1921. It is possible that her progress was checked appreciably at shoal spots about abreast of Independence Dock and at ammunition depot turn but no difficulty was found in moving the ship. Draft at that time 28 feet 11 inches forward and 31 feet 2 inches aft.

COMMANDANT.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, following is the letter of Capt. H. M. Gleason:

JUNE 15, 1922.

HON. C. F. CURRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CURRY: In response to your telegram I am giving below a brief statement of facts regarding the launching of the battleship California, and am also making a few other brief statements of facts concerning the construction record of the Mare Island Navy Yard during recent years. These statements are based on my actual experience at the Mare Island Navy Yard for approximately 10 years (1910-1920), during which it was my good fortune to be construction officer in charge of all construction and repair work, on new vessels under construction, and the conversion and repair of naval vessels in service.

The battleship California was launched exactly on schedule time without any hitch whatever, at 12.45 p. m., October 24, 1920. The chain cables which were used in connection with the launching brakes proved defective and all (10 in number) eventually carried away. The braking effect, however, was sufficient to check the headway of the vessel to such an extent that an emergency anchor, rigged for the purpose, brought the ship to rest as she reached the Vallejo side of the channel. The vessel actually pushed over about 20 of the fender piles of the Vallejo ferry slip as she came to rest. The vessel did not actually touch the bottom at any stage of the launching, nor when she came to rest at the Vallejo side. This is shown conclusively by the fact that she was easily handled by tugs and placed at her berth alongside the navy yard in about 45 minutes, which was very quick work considering the size of the vessel and fact that a fresh north wind was blowing at the time. That the vessel did not touch bottom was also conclusively shown when about a year later she was placed in dry dock and no indication whatever of any grounding was found.

It may be stated in explanation that Mare Island, in common with many other large shipbuilding plants (including the largest yards in the world on the River Clyde, in Scotland), requires some means for checking the momentum of large vessels when launched. For large ships launched at Mare Island an improved type of launching brake was developed and successfully used in launching three large vessels previous to the California. Had no launching brake been used on the California, her momentum was sufficient to have carried her about 2 miles before coming to rest.

I have seen many ships launched, and have personally been in charge of the launching of 22 ships at Mare Island, and I have never seen a more successful launching than the California.

Mare Island's excellent performance in the economical and expeditious construction of vessels is a matter of record, and is generally known to those who care to take interest in such things. Mare Island was the first navy yard to successfully compete with private shipyards in the economical construction of naval vessels, as shown by the costs of destroyers, Mare Island's cost being approximately $200,000 less than the average cost of destroyers built in private yards. Other examples could be cited.

That Mare Island has been able to establish such records of economical construction is due to the many advantages it possesses. For example:

1. Favorable climatic conditions, enabling employees to render full efficiency in their work throughout the entire year.
2. Isolation from the influences and effects of disturbed labor conditions.
3. A highly developed spirit of cooperation among the employees of all classes.
4. An administrative organization developed along modern industrial lines.

The following naval vessels have been constructed at the Mare Island Navy Yard since 1910:

Collier Jupiter (first electrically propelled seagoing vessel).
Fleet tanker Kanawha.
Fleet tanker Maumee.
Fleet tanker Cuyama.
Sixteen destroyers.
Fifteen submarine chasers.
Battleship California (flagship of the Pacific Fleet).
Battleship Montana (under construction).
Numerous small vessels, etc.

The world's record was established in destroyer construction during the World War, when the destroyer Ward was launched on June 1, 1918, in 17½ days (elapsed time) after the laying of the keel.

That Mare Island is accessible to the largest ships that can enter San Francisco Bay is no longer a subject of discussion, or should not be if the skeptic will but let the facts tell the tale. For example, the Army transport Mount Vernon, one of the largest ships in the world (over 700 feet long and drawing about 32 feet), came and went freely from Mare Island without any difficulties whatever.

Also the battleship California, one of the largest battleships in the world (624 feet long and about 31 feet draft), was built and fitted out at Mare Island.

These two instances alone answer all irresponsible statements as to the accessibility of Mare Island.

I have gone but briefly into the matters touched upon in view of the difficulty of properly presenting a subject when involved in too much detail.

With kind regards,
Yours very sincerely,

H. M. GLEASON.

(Capt. H. M. Gleason, United States Navy, retired, construction officer at Mare Island Navy Yard for 10 years and during construction, launching, and fitting out of U. S. S. California.)

Mr. KING. Mr. President, permit me to briefly refer to the letter of Captain Gleason. In addition to refuting the statements concerning the launching of the California, he submits most convincing evidence as to the superb record made in the construction and repair of naval vessels at the navy yard and also the many advantages which Mare Island possesses for the maintenance of a major naval base. He refers to the favorable climatic conditions enabling employees to work during the entire year and reach the highest stage of efficiency. He mentions the fact that a large number of naval vessels have been constructed since 1910, including the battleship California, perhaps the largest war vessel which flies our flag. The Montana, also a superdreadnought, is also under construction at the Mare Island Navy Yard, but will probably, in view of the four-power treaty, be scrapped.

Captain Gleason conclusively disproves the prattle about a "narrow and tortuous channel" and refers to the Mount Vernon, one of the largest ships in the world, which came and went freely during the war without the slightest difficulty.

As stated, the California is one of the largest battleships in the world, with a draft of 31 feet, and it was built and fitted out at Mare Island.

The opponents of Mare Island failed to advise those whom they are seeking to influence of the physical conditions at Mare Island, or of the plans formulated by naval officers of the highest ability for the development of the Mare Island yard into a major naval base. Senators will understand that the plant, as now constructed, does not occupy the south end of Mare Island, but is located some little distance above the southern extremity and along the Mare Island Strait, which separates the yard from the city of Vallejo. It is true that this strait is narrower and shallower than Carquinez Strait into which the Mare Island Channel flows, and which extends easterly for a considerable distance beyond the south end of Mare Island, which borders upon Carquinez Strait. It is, as I have stated, a comparatively easy task to construct at the south end of Mare Island one or more docks and berths for battleships. There is no necessity of constructing the docks or the berthing places upon either bank of the Mare Island Strait. They should be constructed at the end of Mare Island, and that is in harmony with the plan recommended by eminent engineers. The water there is deep, the channel is wide, and a solid foundation upon which to place the docks and the berths can be obtained at a comparatively short distance below the surface. An examination of the map of San Francisco Bay, including Carquinez Strait, shows the large area for naval vessels in the vicinity of Mare Island. More than 40 large war vessels could find anchorage in perfect safety to the east of the south end of Mare Island; in addition, the necessary auxiliary craft could at the same time find suitable anchorage.

Without reading, I desire to put into the RECORD some of the testimony of General Taylor, Assistant Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, who was in charge of river and harbor work in the vicinity of Mare Island, given before the House Appropriations Committee, March 22, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. KING. Following is the testimony:

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1922.

PINOLE SHOALS—MARE ISLAND CHANNEL.

STATEMENTS OF BRIG. GEN. HARRY TAYLOR, ASSISTANT CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY; COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY; AND REAR ADMIRAL L. E. GREGORY, CHIEF, BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Mr. KELLEY. What is your office in the Army, General Taylor?

General TAYLOR. I am the Assistant Chief of Engineers, and particularly in charge of rivers and harbor work.

Mr. KELLEY. You are familiar with the War Department improvements leading from San Francisco to Vallejo?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish you would make a brief statement as to the plans of the War Department, what you are attempting to do, how fast the work is progressing, and when you expect to complete the project according to your plans. First, what the plans are; second, the stage of the work; and, third, when you will be through.

General TAYLOR. The project which has been authorized by Congress provides for a channel across Pinole Shoal, which is the shoal south of the Mare Island Navy Yard or Vallejo, 35 feet deep at mean low water and 500 feet wide; also a channel 35 feet deep into the Mare Island Strait. This is the channel across what is known as Pinole Shoal [indicating on map] and leading up to this deep hole at this point [indicating] and into the Mare Island Strait, the navy yard being situated at this point [indicating]. On the 30th of June this channel was approximately 32 feet deep for the full width of 500 feet.

Mr. KELLEY. That is, through the shoal?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir. There remain some 600,000 yards to be taken out of that channel to complete it to the full project depth of 35 feet. The dredge which is working on that shoal has a capacity of about 100,000 yards a month, so that if we should put a dredge in there and keep her continuously at work it would be a matter of six months to finish the work. Since that time the dredge has been working in the Mare Island Strait along the front of the navy yard. Last June there was a depth of 35 feet in the channel, but since that time a portion of it has shoaled and there is now a depth, I believe, of 31 feet.

Mr. KELLEY. In front of the yard?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir. That is not, however, the full width of the basin.

Mr. OLIVER. What is the extent of the shoal?

General TAYLOR. It is somewhere from 29 to 31 feet.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. That is, including the turning basin of 1,000 feet?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir; there is a little greater depth in front of the navy yard, I think, where we have been working; I think it is very nearly 35 feet deep there, but on the side away from the yard there has been considerable shoaling.

Mr. KELLEY. Was that due to the piers, dikes, and other obstructions there giving way?

General TAYLOR. No, sir; the dike is of material assistance in maintaining this channel, and also in maintaining the channel into the navy yard.

Mr. KELLEY. What causes the filling up of the strait in front of the navy yard?

General TAYLOR. The material which is deposited in the channel and which is brought in largely from the shoals south of the yard.

Mr. KELLEY. And the only remedy for that is constant dredging?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir. As I say, the dikes which have been built are of material assistance, but the dikes alone will not maintain the channel. If it were necessary to finish the channel earlier, we could, by putting in another dredge, complete it in a very short time. The dredge we are using is what we call a seagoing hopper dredge; it is a dredge which sucks the material off the bottom, pumps it into bins in the dredge itself, and then carries it away; we also have some pipe-line dredges, which are working on the Sacramento River farther up, and if necessary we could put one of them in there or we could put another hopper dredge in there.

Mr. KELLEY. So that within the next six months you could make your project depth of 35 feet?

General TAYLOR. We could not get the full depth over the full width in the Mare Island Strait Channel in six months; it would require considerable additional plant to do that—more plant than we have—in six months.

Mr. KELLEY. How long would it take to do it with your present facilities or with facilities that are easily available?

General TAYLOR. We could probably do it in a year and a half to two years.

Mr. KELLEY. That is, make the channel 35 feet deep for the full width of 500 feet and the basin 35 feet the full width?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you any idea as to the annual expense of maintaining it at that depth and width, both the channel and the basin?

General TAYLOR. Both the channel and the basin will probably cost $200,000 a year to maintain.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. I want to get that clear in my mind. That is, it will cost $200,000 a year to maintain the channel and basin regardless of what we do on the dikes?

General TAYLOR. The dikes assist; and without the dikes it would cost more.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. But it will cost $200,000 to keep the channel with the dikes and everything in?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not a very exorbitant charge, is it, for dredging a project of that kind and for as large an establishment as we have there?

General TAYLOR. No, sir; I do not consider it so; I consider it a very small maintenance charge; it certainly is very small as compared with Philadelphia, for instance. It costs us $1,500,000 a year to maintain the channel up to Philadelphia.

Mr. OLIVER. There is considerable commerce on that water, is there not?

General TAYLOR. There certainly is, and it is growing very rapidly.

Mr. OLIVER. And this will make it possible to use much larger boats?

General TAYLOR. There is a great demand for the maintenance of this channel across Pinole Shoal by the commercial interests, without any regard to the navy yard.

Mr. OLIVER. In other words, a large part of the work which we have been discussing is absolutely necessary in order to take care of the commerce?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir; it is entirely independent of the needs of the Navy.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. Let me clear myself up on that. That means that there is a considerable amount of commerce up here, is there? [indicating on map]. The commerce goes up to Vallejo, does it?

General TAYLOR. There is a small amount of commerce up to Vallejo.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. The main commerce, then, is away down here? [indicating on map].

General TAYLOR. Yes; it is through the Pinole Shoal up to these establishments along on the east side of the bay and farther up.

NOTE.—The commerce passing through the Pinole Shoal channel in 1920 amounted to 1,302,778 tons, valued at $36,503,808, and 885,406 passengers.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. I just wanted to get that clear, because we might meet that situation in Congress further along. Now, then, from this point [indicating], which is at the foot of the Mare Island Navy Yard, up to Vallejo there would be very little commerce?

Mr. KELLEY. Vallejo is just across the river from the yard.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. But the general said there was very little commerce up to Vallejo.

General TAYLOR. There is very little commerce that goes to Vallejo.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. So that in here [indicating] it would be purely navy yard dredging?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. How much of the $200,000 does that represent?

General TAYLOR. That is approximately one-half.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. $100,000. In other words, half would be used for the benefit of commerce and half for the benefit of the navy yard?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. Half would be purely for the navy yard?

Mr. OLIVER. The word "purely" would hardly cover it, because there is limited commerce there, not so much as on the main body, but there is a limited commerce going up there.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. But I doubt whether it demands the draft.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think 35 feet would be necessary for the commerce going up to Vallejo.

Mr. KELLEY. General, we are very much obliged and very much gratified.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. In this connection I want to make this further statement: At Mare Island we have only one dry dock capable of holding a battleship, and that dry dock will only take our two older battleships, the Delaware and the North Dakota, so we will have to build another dry dock.

Mr. KELLEY. You will have to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs to get another dry dock.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. I just wanted you to understand that in connection with this particular situation, and I would just like to ask Admiral Gregory how much that dry dock would cost?

Admiral GREGORY. In the neighborhood of $4,000,000.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. And the yard will then take from five to eight battleships, but there will have to be a new dry dock, because this dry dock only takes the older battleships.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it will be perceived that the cost of maintaining the Mare Island channel, as well as Carquinez Strait and Pinole Shoal, is unimportant. It costs a million and a half dollars a year to keep the channel clear at the navy yard at Philadelphia; but General Taylor states that only $200,000 would be required annually for the work at Mare Island and vicinity referred to in his testimony.

Senators will recall that there are privately owned ships passing through the San Francisco Bay and through the Carquinez Strait and for miles beyond the south end of Mare Island. Many of these boats are very large and carry commodities and products of all kinds. It is therefore important that these channels be kept open, and the War Department, under appropriations made for rivers and harbors, has looked after San Francisco Bay, including the straits and channels to which I am now calling attention. Even if there were no Mare Island Navy Yard, the demands of commerce would require that Carquinez Strait be kept in condition for the great ships that pass through the same to discharge and receive products going from and coming into the United States.

I omitted to state that there is already one dry dock at Mare Island, but as stated by Colonel Roosevelt in the testimony which I have just put into the RECORD, another dry dock is necessary in view of the transfer to the Pacific coast of so many of our battleships.

Mr. President, the testimony of General Taylor completely destroys the effect of the figures submitted by the distinguished Senator from Washington. Mr. President, I ask permission to place in the RECORD, without reading, excerpts from Army hearings relating to this matter and collated by Congressman KELLEY. They appear in the House hearings under date of March 16, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. KING. Following are the excerpts:

EXCERPTS FROM ARMY HEARINGS ON CHANNEL.

Mr. KELLEY. I think it might be well to put into the hearings a few excerpts from the Army hearings on this proposition, and that will put them together. I read from page 1764 of the report of the engineers.

Mr. FRENCH. For what year?

Mr. KELLEY. 1921. [Reading:]

"The existing project is about 25 per cent completed. The channel across Pinole Shoal was completed in 1914 under the existing project, and in addition the Navy Department built a pile dike about parallel with the channel from the southwest point of Mare Island."

Is that the dike we are talking about?

Admiral GREGORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY (reading):

"This dike has materially benefited both the Mare Island Strait and the San Pablo Bay channels. During the past year the dredging work done by the San Pablo has increased the controlling depth in San Pablo Bay and Mare Island Strait channels from 26 to 29 feet, with a minimum width of 100 feet. There was a channel of full project width with a controlling depth at the end of the fiscal year of 32 feet over Pinole Shoal in San Pablo Bay and 35 feet in Mare Island Strait channel up to a point opposite Dike No. 10.

"The following work remains to be done."

Then it tells how much dirt has to be taken out to make the project complete.

Mr. CURRY. The project is 500 feet wide, the channel 35 feet deep, and the turning basin 1,000 feet. You will find that in there.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir. It gives three parts of the work yet to be finished. [Reading:]

"(a) To dredge Pinole Shoal channel in San Pablo Bay from the present depth of 32 feet to project depth—total, about 600,000 cubic yards.

"(b) To dredge the channel in Mare Island Strait to project depth.

"(c) To dredge a turning basin opposite the quay wall of Mare Island Navy Yard—total of (b) and (c), about 2,750,000 cubic yards."

Now, the proposed operations for this current year with the funds available.

Colonel ROOSEVELT. May I ask if that is for the coming year or the current year that we are in now?

Mr. KELLEY. The one we are in now. This was last year's report. [Reading:]

"With the funds available at the end of the fiscal year it is proposed to continue the work of deepening the channel through San Pablo Bay and Mare Island Strait to full project depth and width, and to dredge a turning basin in Mare Island Strait. For this work it is proposed to use the hopper dredge San Pablo, belonging to this district, during nine months of the fiscal year 1922, and to operate the patrol boat Suisun by hired labor to enforce fishing regulations and other regulations for the protection of navigable waters. The expenditures will be about as follows:

"New work:
Annual overhauling of dredge San Pablo	$12,000.00
Operation and repairs to dredge San Pablo, 9 months, at $10,000 per month	90,000.00
Pro rata cost of operation of patrol boat Suisun, 12 months, at $250 per month	3,000.00
Engineering, superintendence, and contingencies	8,832.36
Total	113,832.36

"With the funds remaining ($143,000), the following work is proposed for the fiscal year 1923:

"New work:
Annual overhauling of dredge San Pablo	$12,000.00
Operation and repairs to dredge San Pablo, 12 months, at $10,000 per month	120,000.00
Pro rata cost of operation of patrol boat Suisun, 12 months, at $150 per month	1,800.00
Engineering, superintendence, and contingencies, and office expenses	9,200.00
Total	143,000.00

"No additional funds for the fiscal year 1923 are requested, as those on hand are believed sufficient for all urgent work during the fiscal year 1923."

WIDTH AND DEPTH OF CHANNEL.

So that puts up the proposition that the Army is going ahead with the project to complete it as it was originally planned, 35 feet deep and of a certain width.

Mr. CURRY. Five hundred feet wide.

Mr. KELLEY. If we make this improvement, then we protect the channel from being filled in again and the yard then will have a clear channel to the Pacific of 35 feet in depth at low water?

Mr. CURRY. That is the project. Over Pinole Shoal there is more than 35 feet now.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask the officer if he approves of that last statement that we will not have to spend money to maintain the channel?

Admiral GREGORY. Except for minor annual dredging. That is my understanding; yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. And you think that result will follow?

Admiral GREGORY. I do.

Mr. KING. I call attention to the statement of Congressman CURRY in the testimony just presented, wherein he states that there are now more than 35 feet depth over Pinole Shoal. I call attention of Senators to the fact that Pinole Shoal has been called a "shallow and tortuous channel." The fact is that the largest boats, the largest war vessels, and all other craft can pass through Pinole Shoal to the Carquinez Strait, to Mare Island, and beyond without the slightest difficulty. The depth and width of the channel are ample for the largest craft.

Mr. President, I ask that the following letter addressed to Congressman CURRY be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
U. S. COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY,
Washington, June 14, 1922.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY,
Chairman Committee on the Territories,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to the various questions asked in your letter of the 13th instant, I take pleasure in advising you as follows:

1. The controlling depths at mean lower low water through various sections of the main ship channel from the sea to the entrance to Mare Island Strait are as follows:

	Feet.
(a) From deep water in the open sea to the Golden Gate:
Via Bonita Channel	54
Via main ship channel	36
(b) Golden Gate to Pinole Shoal	36
(c) Through Pinole Shoal (dredged channel). (This is the depth reported to exist June 30, 1912, by the Chief of Engineers.)	32
(d) Pinole Shoal to entrance Mare Island Strait	38

The foregoing are the least depths a vessel would encounter if traversing this area at the time of mean lower low water. The depths are generally in excess of those here listed.

The mean range of tide over Pinole Shoal is 4.6 feet.

2. It is undoubtedly true that a greater depth is required across the bar outside the entrance to the Golden Gate than is necessary in the placid waters in the upper bay channel (Pinole Shoal and Mare Island Strait) in order to accommodate the same draft vessels. This, of course, is due to the fact that the bar is exposed to the ocean swells and that in such a swell the trough of the waves falls some distance below the level of the undisturbed water. A vessel crossing the bar in such a swell must expect to be lowered an appreciable amount, and allowance for this factor must therefore be made in considering whether it is practicable for a vessel of specified draft to cross the bar.

3. I have stated in reply to your first question that the controlling depth from the sea to the entrance to Mare Island Strait is 32 feet.

4. The assertion that the approach to this area is through a "narrow and tortuous channel" is scarcely justified by the facts. "Narrow" and "tortuous" are comparative terms, and our charts show that the channel through this area is less narrow and tortuous than are the majority of the channels leading from the sea to our other principal navy yards in the United States.

5. The following data refer to the area available for anchorage extending from the eastern end of Pinole Shoal to Suisun Point:

Maximum depth, 117 feet.

Length of area over 30 feet deep, 9 nautical miles.

Average width of same area, slightly less than one-half nautical mile.

This area provides anchorage room for a considerable fleet. Allowing 35 feet as a minimum depth in which a capital ship should anchor and 500 yards diameter for each berth for such ships, it is estimated that 40 capital ships could anchor in this area and leave some room for a fleet of auxiliaries.

Trusting that the foregoing may be of service to you, I am,

Respectfully yours,
WILLIAM BOWIE, Acting Director.

Mr. KING. The significance of this letter will be apparent if it is carefully read in connection with the claim that the channel leading to Mare Island and beyond is too narrow and shallow for large naval craft. It will be perceived that the main ship channel leading from the open sea into San Francisco Bay is only 36 feet in depth. The letter states that from the Golden Gate to Pinole Shoal the same depth is maintained. Through Pinole Shoal the depth is 32 feet, reported June 30, 1921.

It will be observed that these are the lowest depths a vessel would encounter at the time of mean lower low water, and as the acting director states, the mean range of tide over Pinole Shoal is 4 feet 6 inches.

Another fact is stated which is important to be considered, namely, that a greater depth is required across the bar outside the entrance to the Golden Gate than in the placid waters in the upper bay channel; that is, Pinole Shoal and Mare Island Strait.

I direct Senators' attention to the statement of Major Bowie that the "assertion that the approach to Mare Island is through a narrow and tortuous channel is scarcely justified by the facts." He states that the channel is less narrow and tortuous than are the majority of channels leading from the sea to our other principal navy yards in the United States. Referring to the available anchorage in the vicinity of Mare Island, the acting director states that there is ample room for 40 capital ships and a fleet of auxiliaries.

Mr. President, in order that Senators may have some standard for comparison I have had compiled by a naval expert statistics on channel depths and available anchorage ground for naval bases of the United States and have compared them with the anchorage ground of the proposed development at Mare Island. I ask that this information and statement be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

PROPOSED BASE AT CARQUINEZ STRAIT (MARE ISLAND).

The Carquinez Strait site is 26 miles from the open sea; is situated on deep water having a 40-foot channel immediately in front of the yard, 3,800 feet in width. The adjacent anchorage ground has an area of approximately 3½ square miles. In comparing this site with the other yards shown it will be seen that the 40-foot channel and adjacent anchorage is wider and more extensive than any other yard shown. It further has the advantage of the anchorages in the channel in San Pablo and San Francisco Bays, of McNears Point and Alameda, giving a total fleet anchorage contiguous to the proposed site of approximately 16 square miles. This base (Mare Island) is well behind the coastal defenses and outside the range of gunfire from an attacking fleet, as shown by the arc generated from the Carquinez Strait site with a radius of 32,000 yards as maximum range of a 14-inch gun. With its easy access to the sea, its adjacent anchorage, its supplementary anchorage areas, and its natural protection from enemy attack, it will be superior to any other naval base in the United States or any other country.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.

The Portsmouth Navy Yard is situated on an island in the Piscataqua River about 4 nautical miles from its mouth. The width of channel of all depths in front of the yard is 1,000 feet, the width of 40-foot depth in front of the yard is 400 feet, and the width of water between 30 and 40 foot depth is 400 feet. The total anchorage in the vicinity is confined to the 40-foot depth in the Piscataqua River between the yard and the sea, and the total area will not accommodate more than two or three capital ships, and these at some distance from the yard. In this connection it may be well to bear in mind for comparison that the width of channel immediately in front of the Carquinez Strait site it 3,800 feet, and the total anchorage area adjacent to the yard for capital ships is 3.55 square miles.

BOSTON.

The navy yard at Boston, Mass., is distant from the sea 8½ miles (nautical). The entire width of channel in front of the yard is 1,300 feet. There is no 40-foot depth in front of the yard or within several miles. The width of the 30-foot channel in front of the yard is 1,200 feet. Area of adjacent anchorage ground for capital ships, none. The only anchorage is in the outer bay; the edge of this is 6 miles distant from the yard. Compare the entire lack of 40-foot channel and 1,200-foot width of 30-foot channel with the 3,800 feet of 40-foot channel in front of the Carquinez Strait site and its area of 3½ square miles.

NEW YORK.

The open sea may be placed for practical purposes at the mouth of the Ambrose Channel. There is limited anchorage ground at Tompkinsville, off Staten Island, but this would hold only a comparatively small number of capital ships and is a considerable distance from the yard. The yard is 15 miles from the open sea and is approached by various artificial channels involving turns, and just as difficult, if not more difficult, of navigation than the comparatively short stretch of virtually straight channel through Pinole Shoal approaching the Carquinez Strait site. The width of 40-foot channel in front of the yard is 1,500 feet, but this is nothing but the Wallabout Basin inclosed by the yard proper. The governing depth of approach channel is 30 feet at mean low water. This situation should be compared with the width and depth of water at Carquinez Strait.

The lack of danger or difficulty of navigating through the short stretch of Pinole Shoal should be compared with the difficulties of navigating from the open sea into New York Harbor, and thence by Battery or by Buttermilk Channel into the East River and the Wallabout Basin of the yard.

PHILADELPHIA.

This yard is situated up the Delaware River some 88 miles from the open sea. The width of 40-foot channel in front of the yard is none. The width of the 30-foot channel but less than 40 feet is 900 feet. The width of channel less than 30-foot is 300 feet. It would seem unnecessary to compare this yard in any respect with the proposed Carquinez Strait site.

NORFOLK.

The channel from the navy yard to Hampton Roads is 500 feet in width and has been dredged to 35-foot depth. The distance from this yard to the sea is 35 miles, and its distance to the fleet anchorage ground is 14 miles.

Hampton Roads is the main fleet anchorage ground and mobilization point for the Atlantic coast, but the width of this 40-foot anchorage ground in Hampton Roads, generally considered as the best rendezvous harbor in America, is actually only the same as the width of 40-foot water in front of the Carquinez Strait site. In addition to this, the holding ground at Hampton Roads is poor, the currents are swifter, and sea conditions for small boats are notoriously bad. More than this, the entire area of 40-foot depth in Hampton Roads is not materially greater than the total area adjacent to the Carquinez Strait site.

PUGET SOUND NAVY YARD.

This yard is 135 miles from the sea. The width of 40-foot channel in front of the yard is 3,000 feet, and the narrowest part of the approach channel is only 1,000 feet in width. There is adjacent to the yard considerable anchorage ground, but the main anchorage ground would, in all probability, be adjacent to Blake Island, 7 miles away. A number of ships, of course, could be placed in Port Orchard, inland (running up the middle of the chart). Except for its excessive depths, Puget Sound forms an ideal base. Nevertheless, the deep water immediately in front of the yard is actually less than at Carquinez Strait and in addition is poor holding ground.

PEARL HARBOR.

Pearl Harbor has an artificially constructed channel from the open sea to Pearl Harbor. This channel is 35 feet in depth below mean lower low water and has many turns. The yard is 4 miles from the open sea. The width of channel in front of the yard of 40-foot depth is 450 feet. The width of channel between 30 and 40 feet is 750 feet. There is adjacent to, but not immediately in front of, the yard anchorage ground for a few capital ships, but this harbor could not be considered suitable for a fleet anchorage or a fleet rendezvous. In any event, its deep water immediately in front of the yard can not be compared with Carquinez Strait.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one of the ablest men in the Navy is Capt. E. L. Beach, now retired. For years he was commandant at the Mare Island Navy Yard, and has made a more extensive study of conditions there and at all other suggested sites for a naval base in the San Francisco Bay than any other person except perhaps Capt. L. M. Cox. He presented to the joint congressional committee on November 18, 1920, a comprehensive statement in which were considered all objections urged against Mare Island, and also an analysis of the reports of the Helm and Parkes-McKeen Boards. I regret that the length of the statement, which is in the nature of testimony, precludes its being read at this time.

He also reviewed all questions involved in the establishment of a naval home station or base in the San Francisco Bay, and demonstrated beyond all question that Mare Island was the most suitable place; and that it would be an extravagant folly to establish a naval base at Alameda or Hunters Point or any other place within such bay. He quoted Captain Bennett, commandant at Mare Island for a number of years, who stated that in his opinion there was no necessity for creating another naval station, and that with increased equipment Mare Island would be capable of serving the fleet as one of the main home bases.

Captain Beach, after referring to the amount invested by the Government at Mare Island, the vast amount of work there performed in the building and repair of ships, the great efficiency and economy obtained, the fact that without further equipment the yard could care for the needs of 90 per cent of the fleet, and that with the expenditure of a reasonable sum it could fully provide all needed docks, berthing places, equipment, and other modern requirements for the entire fleet of the United States, then states that notwithstanding all of these factors it would seem "there must be some great ulterior reason, not yet stated or mentioned in the Helm Board report or in any other place, that would cause the Government to construct a naval base at some other place near Mare Island, thereby causing the Government to sacrifice what it has at Mare Island, and to construct a great naval base at an expenditure of at least $60,000,000 and probably more at a place within 35 miles of Mare Island."

Referring to the question of berths for ships, he states that additional berths are required, but at present more than 50 ships are berthed at the Carquinez Strait station at Mare Island, ranging from battleships to craft including cruisers, destroyers, and so forth. He states that except at the fresh-water basin at Philadelphia, where ships are laid up in reserve, at no navy yard in the United States are there so many ships berthed as at Mare Island.

Speaking of anchorage ground and the contention that it is limited, Captain Beach states that the docking and berthing stations at the south end of Mare Island would "butt right into the deep water of Carquinez Strait, where anchorage ground extends for 8 miles and provides a better anchorage ground than possessed by any navy yard in the United States." He directs attention to other navy yards in the United States, and shows the superiority of Mare Island as a naval base and for anchorage purposes. Captain Beach refers to the condition of the channel extending from San Pablo Bay, which is a part of San Francisco Bay, to Pinole Shoal and the changes since 1916; he also states that for commercial purposes solely a 35-foot channel at mean low water already exists, and that at a comparatively small expense a 40-foot channel at mean low water, 1,000 feet wide, can be maintained. Senators will recall that the tide will add more than 4 feet additional to the low-water depth. Captain Beach quotes from Colonel Reese, who testified that a channel 40 feet deep could be maintained, the cost gradually diminishing so that it would be at the end of 10 years not to exceed $65,000 per annum. Some of the advantages of a naval base at Mare Island referred to in the Helm report are mentioned by Captain Beach. Both the Helm board and Captain Beach emphasize that a naval station at Mare Island "is removed from gunfire from the open sea and protected from attack by a fleet or by land forces. The mountainous region between the navy yard and the coast render hostile movement toward it extremely difficult." The Helm board, referring to this matter, say: "Mare Island has great advantage over any location available for a navy yard in San Francisco Bay." The Helm board also emphasize the advantages of climatic conditions as an important contribution to the efficiency of labor, and "that owing to the equable character of the weather a full day's work can be performed practically every day of the year. No fogs interfere as they do in the lower bay in the vicinity of Alameda."

Reference is made in the Helm report to the excellent quality of the water, which is "free from scale-forming minerals," to the harmonious relations between labor and the administration, and the permanency of the employees, most of whom own their own homes and live adjoining the yard.

The strategic location of Mare Island the Helm Board state to be "most admirable, with land area sufficient for a first-class yard, including submarine and aviation base and the usual auxiliary activities of a naval base." The defensibility of Mare Island is denominated excellent by the Helm Board, and it is stated that fuel oil is easily obtainable and a large supply near at hand; that there are excellent dry docks, the larger of which can accommodate more than 90 per cent of the fleet as completed in 1921. Captain Beach quotes this statement from the Helm Board: "Mare Island has many advantages, due to defensive location, climate, labor supply, existing dry docks and shops, plant equipment, and various navy-yard exercises of great value and possible service to the fleet." Captain Beach marshals the reasons in favor of Mare Island and, as I have stated, successfully confutes all opponents. He states that it is the "greatest navy yard in the United States, because it handles more ships, repairs them, keeps them, loads them, than any other two navy yards in the country combined." More than 200 vessels were repaired in this yard during the fiscal year ending June 20, 1920, having a total displacement of 494,134 tons of an indicated horsepower of 2,175,124 and of a total cost of more than $156,500,000. During that year more than "three times as many ships were repaired at Mare Island as were based on both Mare Island and Puget Sound combined in 1916."

Mr. President, I ask that this report of Captain Beach be printed in the RECORD as an appendix following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, Commander L. M. Cox has been referred to as one of the ablest officers in the Navy. For years he was in charge of Mare Island, and he prepared and presented a complete plan for such expansion of the navy yard at Mare Island as would be necessary to meet all future needs of whatever fleet the United States might have in the waters of the Pacific. He has made a thorough study of San Francisco Bay and all possible points therein for the establishment of a home or major naval base. He testified before the congressional committee, his testimony appearing on pages 116 to 128 of the hearings, and I ask that excerpts from his testimony be printed, following my remarks, as an appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KING. Speaking of Alameda as a possible naval base, he—Captain Cox—states that the "development of the land requires an average fill of 20 feet in order to bring the land to a yard level of 12 feet above mean lower low water." As I have indicated, this proposed site is a muddy flat, covered with water of varying depths. Borings have been made to a depth of 150 feet for the purpose of determining whether solid ground could be obtained. In order to construct suitable permanent dry docks and berthing stations and piers a solid foundation is required. The borings indicate that the Alameda site is not suitable for a naval base and that a solid foundation can not be found at a depth of 150 feet. Captain Cox states that the conditions are such that it would be difficult, hazardous, and unsafe to construct a naval base at this point, and he further declares "that it would be unwise to attempt such construction without resorting to radical measures." I should add that Captain Cox constructed the dry docks at Pearl Harbor and has constructed other docks, and is one of the most eminent men of his profession in the United States, if not in the world. He refers to the great deposits of silt at Alameda, amounting to "3 feet per year, which would require constant dredging." Captain Cox submitted to the commission the borings and the drawings of his plan for a major naval station at Mare Island, including sufficient dry-dock facilities, berthing places, and so forth. He states that the docks would rest on solid rock. Senators will bear in mind that Mare Island is practically a peninsula. On the east is the Mare Island Strait, or Channel, which flows into the waters of Carquinez Strait, which is in effect a part of San Francisco Bay. The waters of Carquinez Strait are much deeper than those of the Mare Island Strait, and the former strait is very much wider than the latter. He states that the Army engineers report that it is practical to maintain a depth of 35 feet in the Mare Island Strait, and they have authority from the War Department to make such excavation. His view, however, is that the restricted width of the Mare Island Channel requires the construction of the berths and docks at the southerly end of Mare Island, which is washed by the waters of the Carquinez Strait. He states that the ideal location for a suitable docking depot is "off the south end of Mare Island, where its water front would abut on the deep water of Carquinez Strait, involving a minimum of dredging; where foundation conditions are excellent; where the shops and facilities now existing at Mare Island could be utilized to the fullest extent; where Mare Island's ideal labor conditions and ideal climate could be enjoyed; and, finally, where the two stations could be under one administration and could operate under one administrative overhead." He refers to the fact that the Mount Vernon, a ship drawing as much water as the largest battleship afloat and of considerable greater length, was berthed and accommodated at the yard in the Mare Island Strait.

I ask that there may be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks excerpts from the testimony given by Capt. H. M. Gleason before the joint congressional commission. His testimony will be found on pages 133 to 136, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KING. I desire to state that Captain Gleason was educated at the Naval Academy and is an engineer of naval architecture. He is familiar with Mare Island and has studied the questions involved in the establishment of a major naval base. He indorses the views of Captain Beach and Captain Cox and strongly supports the view that Mare Island is the proper place for such a station, and declares that to "establish another project down the bay," referring to Alameda, "would amount to a criminal expenditure of the people's money to the amount of $60,000,000."

When the joint congressional committee was engaged in taking testimony Congressman CURRY submitted a telegram from Captain Knox, of the Navy. The telegram is what might be termed a review of the strategic advantages of Mare Island, or, as it is called, "Carquinez Strait site," for a naval base. He reaches the conclusion that in "balancing the advantages and disadvantages of the Alameda and lower bay sites and the Mare Island site the superiority is in favor of the latter."

I ask to have inserted at the close of my remarks, as an appendix, this telegram and Congressman CURRY's letter to the committee inclosing the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KING. Capt. J. M. Ellicott, of the Navy, was at Mare Island for some time and was called upon to examine the plans for dry docks and piers at the south end of Mare Island, abutting on Carquinez Strait. The plan referred to was the one submitted by Captain Cox, of whom I have spoken. Captain Ellicott at one time had some doubt as to the availability of Mare Island for a major naval base, as he found that Mare Island Strait lacked the space and depth to accommodate superdreadnaughts and sufficient dry docks and berthing piers, but upon examining the Cox plan he states:

> I felt exactly like a mathematician who has worked persistently and unsuccessfully upon a difficult equation until nearly giving it up and then comes upon a definite, concrete, exact solution.

He states that the Cox plan shows conclusively and convincingly the availability of Mare Island for a major naval base. In a letter to Congressman CURRY, dated November 19, 1920, he gives his views, and in another communication of November 3, 1920, addressed to Congressman CURRY, he examines the claim that Carquinez Strait does not afford sufficient anchorage for the fleet. He shows that the anchorage ground within the Carquinez Strait is 8 miles in length and one-half to three-fourths of a mile in width. In addition to this anchorage ground "there extends from Benicia northward, along the Solano County shore, a further anchorage area three-fourths of a mile wide and 4 miles long, which would accommodate 50 war vessels in the most sheltered position to be found in San Francisco Bay." This, together with the berthing space in Mare Island Straits, "gives the Carquinez site an anchorage berthing capacity for at least one-quarter of a war fleet of 700 vessels." He adds that so far as anchorage room is concerned "honors are absolutely even between the three main sites under consideration in San Francisco Bay."

I ask that these letters from Captain Ellicott be inserted at the close of my remarks as an appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection your request will be granted.

Mr. KING. Col. E. P. O'Hern, of the Ordnance Department of the Army, in a communication to Congressman CURRY under date of October 21, 1921, examines the question as to which would be the best site for a naval base, Hunters Point, Alameda, or Mare Island, and reaches the conclusion that the latter, being beyond the range of the most powerful ship guns from any point on the coast, is the most suitable. He also states the position taken by the General Staff of the Army, "that for defensive reasons no future arsenal for the manufacture or storage of Army ordnance supplies should be located on or near a coast line." He also states that a similar principle would seem to be applicable to naval activities.

I ask that this communication be inserted in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have here before me the testimony of Mr. Howard C. Holmes, one of the leading civil engineers in the United States, and who is familiar with dry docks and the proposed sites for a naval base in San Francisco Bay. He submits reasons why Alameda is not a suitable place for a naval base, and particularly for the building of dry docks. He calls attention to the borings at Alameda, and the fact that after going to a depth of 150 feet solid ground was not discovered. I ask that his testimony given before the congressional committee be inserted as an appendix at the close of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I also ask that a letter addressed to Congressman CURRY by Brigadier General Mitchell, of the United States Army, be inserted as an appendix at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion a calm and dispassionate review of all the facts bearing upon the establishment of a major naval base in the upper or lower San Francisco Bay will justify the position which I have taken and confirm the views of the officers and experts whose reports and statements I have submitted that Mare Island is the most suitable point for such naval base and that it would be unwise to abandon Mare Island or to establish at Alameda a naval base. I hope this agitation by real-estate agents and others, as well as by a small coterie in the Navy, to build at Alameda a naval base will end and that the Navy Department will make such improvements at Mare Island as will fully equip it for all needed uses for which a major naval base is required in San Francisco Bay.

APPENDIX No. 1.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. EDWARD L. BEACH.

UNITED STATES NAVY YARD,
Mare Island, Calif., Thursday, November 18, 1920.

Senators and Representatives of Congressional Committee:

This navy yard was established in 1854, 66 years ago, with Commander David G. Farragut as the first commandant. It has grown constantly in its capacity for work and in its service to the Navy Department, but more especially in the last four years, since the navy yard's capabilities were carefully studied by what is known as the Helm Board. This Helm Board made a careful study of the needs for a great naval base on the Pacific, and of what place was best suited to be this base. The Helm Board report, which is a public document No. 1946, part 2, 1917, contains more careful study of the requirements of a Pacific coast naval base and of Mare Island's advantages and disadvantages than any other single document. I therefore refer to this report because it has made a particular study of Mare Island's disadvantages, and it is not believed that there can be any criticisms of Mare Island that are not found in this report.

The proposition is that the Carquinez Strait Station, as conceived and designed by Commander Cox, which is Mare Island, is not suited to greater development and is therefore not available as the site for the great naval base. It is reasonable to believe that the Government officials who picked out Mare Island in 1854 as the Pacific coast navy yard considered different available sites, and that Mare Island was best suited then for the purpose. Sixty-six years later, by an act of Congress, a study is to be made as to which is the best site for a great base—Carquinez Strait, Alameda, or Hunters Point. If Mare Island has performed its duty with great success for 66 years, and if a great establishment has been built; if the Government has invested in it over $32,000,000; if it is the second largest navy yard, counted either by number of employees or value of product, in the United States; if it is efficient in the repair, upkeep, and supplying of more than a quarter of all the vessels of the United States Navy; if in the last year the Government spent at Mare Island $60,000,000 with never a criticism or failure in any respect to meet the Government's requirements; if Mare Island ranks first of all Government navy yards in efficency and economy; if Mare Island is able to take care of the needs of 90 per cent of the fleet; if Mare Island with an expenditure of $26,000,000 can be made capable of taking care of 100 per cent of the fleet—that is, to provide facilities for anything required by the greatest of superdreadnaughts; if Mare Island with a comparatively small expense for additional facilities can supply everything for every class of ship of the fleet; if Mare Island provides for every requirement laid down by the General Board and by the judgment of farsighted, experienced officers, then it would seem that there must be some great ulterior reason not yet studied or mentioned in the Helm Board report or in any other place that would cause the Government to construct a naval base at some other place near Mare Island, thereby causing the Government to sacrifice what it has at Mare Island and to construct a great naval base at an expenditure of at least $60,000,000 and probably more at a place within 35 miles of Mare Island.

The Helm Report, page 40, paragraph 99 (i), states that "the present dry docks at Mare Island can accommodate 90 per cent of the vessels of the fleet as completed in 1921." If by comparatively small expense Carquinez Strait Station can be made to take care of the additional 10 per cent, is it economical, good business, and good judgment to locate within 35 miles another naval base, at a cost which will vary between $60,000,000 and $100,000,000, and throw away the 90 per cent capability that Mare Island is reported by the Helm Board to have, and, further, probably ultimately to sacrifice the Government's investment at Mare Island and its splendid capabilities?

A discussion will now be made of every single disadvantage quoted by the Helm Board against Mare Island. These disadvantages are stated as follows:

(A) EXPENSE OF MAINTAINING CHANNEL APPROACHES AT SUITABLE DEPTH.

This is really the only disadvantage stated which is in any sense a controlling factor. The other alleged disadvantages disappear upon consideration. This disadvantage will be discussed later.

(B) DIFFICULTIES OF NAVIGATION IN NARROW APPROACH CHANNELS UNDER FAVORABLE CONDITIONS.

With regard to this it is a matter of statistics that there is much less fog at Mare Island than in the lower San Francisco Bay. Further, that in the 66 years that ships have been coming to and from Mare Island I have never heard of a single ship that ever went aground proceeding from San Francisco to Mare Island. In the last 21 months that I have been on duty here there have been many hundreds of ships that have come to and from the lower bay to Mare Island. There has never been one that ever went aground or reported that it could not navigate because of the fog or that was interfered with by the fog. It is to be remembered that there is not much fog at Mare Island.

(C) SWIFT CURRENTS RENDERING MANEUVERING IN NAVY-YARD WATERS, ESPECIALLY WHEN ENTERING DRY DOCK, DIFFICULT EXCEPT AT SLACK WATER.

The currents at Carquinez Strait Station are practically the same as at other parts of the bay. They are no greater than the currents leading to the New York Navy Yard or the Boston Navy Yard or the Norfolk Navy Yard. There is never occasion for a great ship to attempt to go in dry dock except at slack water.

(D) BERTHING SPACES QUITE INADEQUATE AT PRESENT AND IMPRACTICABLE TO OBTAIN TO AS GREAT EXTENT AS WOULD BE NECESSARY FOR A FIRST-CLASS YARD.

It is true that there are not as many berths at Mare Island as is desired, but berths for ships do not exist naturally; they must be made. There are no berths at all at Alameda or Hunters Point and will not be until they are built there. At present there are 50 and more ships berthed at Carquinez Strait Station, ranging from predreadnaught battleships to small craft, including cruisers, destroyers, etc. Except at the fresh-water basin at Philadelphia, where ships are laid up in reserve, at no navy yard in the United States are there so many ships berthed as at present at Carquinez Strait Station. If the plan of berthing as designed by Commander Cox be created here, and there is ample space for it, Carquinez Strait Station will have the greatest facilities for berthing of any navy yard in the United States.

(E) MUDDY BOTTOM, WITH A TENDENCY TO CAUSE CLOGGING OF CONDENSERS AND PIPES WHEN LARGE VESSELS ENTER UNDER THEIR OWN ENGINES UNDER UNFAVORABLE CONDITIONS, DUE TO INSUFFICIENT DEPTHS OF WATER.

In the approaches to Carquinez Strait Station there is natural deep water of 40 feet and over everywhere except over Pinole Shoal, a stretch of 8 miles. This has been dredged by Army Engineers for commercial purposes for the oil companies, sugar refineries, etc., to a depth at low water in its shallowest part of 32 feet; at high water, 38 feet. For the greatest part of the channel over Pinole Shoal the average depth is 35 feet. There is no occasion for heavy draft ships to pick up mud in proceeding to the Carquinez Strait Station. It is to be noted that the Army transport Mount Vernon, drawing more than 32 feet, went over this shoal four times without experiencing this disadvantage. The Army engineers have reported that it is entirely feasible to maintain this channel at a 40-foot depth at low water, with a width of 1,000 feet if desired.

(F) WATER AREA LIMITED IN EXTENT, INTERFERING WITH SAFE MOVEMENT OF VESSELS, ETC.

This is correct as applying to Mare Island Strait. It is entirely incorrect as applying to ships maneuvering to get into dry docks or berths at the docking station at the southern end of Mare Island. Mare Island Straits, which have a present depth of 33 feet at high water, is now being dredged by Army Engineers, and they report a depth of 35 feet at low water can be maintained. Ships for long overhauls will be brought up the straits, which will be the greatest fitting-out basin possessed by any navy yard of the country; but no maneuvering will be required in the Mare Island Strait; all maneuvering and turning will be in Carquinez Strait, where there is ample space and over 40 feet depth everywhere.

(G) ANCHORAGE GROUND VERY LIMITED AT NAVY YARD—AVAILABLE ANCHORAGE ABOUT 3 MILES DISTANT BUT WATER FREQUENTLY TOO ROUGH FOR CONVENIENT USE OF SMALL BOATS AND QUITE UNDESIRABLE FOR VESSELS UNDER REFITTING OR REPAIR.

Carquinez Strait Station, where docking and berthing of great ships would be carried on in accordance with Commander Cox's design, butts right into the deep water of Carquinez Strait. It butts into an anchorage ground that is far greater in extent, stretching as it does for about 8 miles, than will ever be required for ships at the Carquinez Strait Station for overhaul, docking, supplies, etc. The Carquinez Strait provides a better anchorage ground for the Carquinez Strait Station than is possessed by any navy yard in the country. To begin with, there is no anchorage ground so close. The anchorage ground at the Portsmouth Navy Yard is limited in extent and several miles below the navy yard. Everyone in the Navy is aware of the tremendous currents in the Piscataqua River. There is but little anchorage ground for the Boston Navy Yard; only two or three or four ships at most could be anchored there. The anchorage ground for the New York Navy Yard is about 10 miles away, off Staten Island. There is not much anchorage ground for the Philadelphia Navy Yard. The anchorage ground for the Norfolk yard is 15 miles away, at Old Point Comfort. Nor at the other navy yards is there any anchorage ground that permits many ships to be anchored. No navy yard in the country is so splendidly provided with anchorage ground as is the Carquinez Strait Station.

(h) "Inadequate supply, within reasonable distance, of materials required by the fleet and in shipbuilding and repair work."

This is certainly not borne out by results at the Mare Island Navy Yard. In spite of this statement of "inadequate supply," Mare Island during the war built destroyers in quicker time than at any navy yard or at any private shipbuilding plant. The destroyed Ward was actually launched in 17½ days after her keel was laid, and in 108 days after her keel was laid she was in commission, completely equipped and ready to steam away to the war. Between July 1, 1919, and July 1, 1920, $60,000,000 was spent by the Navy Department at the Mare Island Navy Yard. Out of every $15 spent on the Navy for all purposes by the Navy Department $1 was actually spent at Mare Island. As a matter of fact, the Carquinez Strait Station is better situated with regard to supplies than either Hunters Point or Alameda, because practically all supplies are brought by freight from the East by means of the railway over the causeway to Mare Island. Mare Island is in direct connection with the transcontinental railroad lines, and by this means receives freight many hours earlier than San Francisco, because freight to San Francisco must be ferried over Carquinez Strait from Benicia.

On page 41, under article 101 (a), the Helm report states that it is "impracticable and unadvisable to develop Mare Island as a navy yard suitable for the largest vessels with 40-foot depths at mean low water in its channel approaches." Army engineers state that since this report was written they have had much experience with the channel leading to the Carquinez Strait Station, and that it is entirely feasible to have a 40-foot approach. They state that the average depth at low water over the shallowest part of Pinole Shoal, except in a small part where it is over 32 feet, is now 35 feet, with 41 feet at high water; that the cost and ease of maintaining this is much less than originally expected, and they therefore believe that the cost of a 40-foot channel will be much less than originally estimated.

With regard to this 35-foot channel over Pinole Shoal, attention is invited to the fact that this depth was created for the benefit of commerce and that the Navy Department has never had to pay a cent of this cost.

Page 41, article 101 (b), states that it is "impracticable and unadvisable to attempt to develop Mare Island as a navy yard of intermediate capacity with a 35-foot depth at mean low water in channel approaches." The answer to this is that this 35-foot depth at mean low water already exists, except for a small part of the channel where the present depth is over 32 feet.

On page 15, paragraph 19, of the Helm Board report, it is stated that there are "physical limitations which make it impracticable and unadvisable," etc. The Army transport Mount Vernon, drawing more than 32 feet, passed through this channel repeatedly. The additional facilities needed by superdreadnaughts can certainly be constructed at Carquinez Strait Station and the greatest ships can proceed there. The question is rather advisability than capability.

Page 27, paragraph 61, of the Helm Board report states that the "rapid silting of the channel and basin has been a constant source of expense and inconvenience." This is true, but to a greater extent formerly than at present. The silting was partly caused by the washing away of gold-bearing sand in rivers emptying into the bay by hydraulic mining. This has now been forbidden by law, and part of the cost of this silting has been removed.

Paragraph 63 of the same page refers to the inadequate anchorage ground. Carquinez Strait anchorage ground is far more protected and safer than any anchorage ground in any other part of San Francisco Bay. Some months ago, at a time of bad weather, shipping was much injured in the lower bay. One Navy vessel was damaged to the extent of $140,000. It was impossible for small boats to do any boating at all. On account of the protection that naturally exists in the Carquinez Strait there was no damage of any kind to shipping in this locality.

Page 29, article 68, of the Helm Board report states that "there is no direct railroad connection with the mainland." This was true in 1916. It is not true to-day.

Article 69 states that "practically all material is shipped from the East." Because of Mare Island's railway connection she receives this material hours before it could possibly get to Alameda or Hunters Point.

Page 32, article 67, states that "one of the most serious deficiencies at the Mare Island Navy Yard is great lack of berthing spaces, and much of that existing is not altogether satisfactory." This is absolutely true, but nevertheless there are 50 ships and more berthed at the present moment at the Carquinez Strait Station, more than at any other navy yard except in the fresh-water basin at Philadelphia. Berthing spaces have to be built. If this is an objection to Mare Island at present, it is a far greater objection to Hunters Point or Alameda, because there are no berthing spaces there at all. Berthing spaces do not exist until they are built. All the berthing spaces needed can be provided at Carquinez Strait Station in much less time and at much less cost than at Hunters Point or Alameda.

Page 33, article 79, states that "among the most serious disadvantages of the Mare Island Navy Yard are lack of adequate depth in channel approaches." The answer to this is that there is already practically an average low-water depth of 35 feet, which can easily be made 40 feet at but comparatively small expense.

The report states that "there is limited water area of suitable depth immediately adjacent to the navy yard." In answer to this, it is a fact that Carquinez Strait Station provides the greatest water area for anchorage purposes possessed by any navy yard in the country. It is indeed immediately adjacent to the navy yard, because the proposed Carquinez Strait docking station projects into it. There is no inherent difficulty at all of providing adequate berthing accommodations required. Referring to the statement that "providing a 40-foot depth involves expenditures of a serious character," etc., that is true, but these are not nearly so serious as would be required by the creation of a naval base at Hunters Point or Alameda.

On page 39, article 96, it is stated that "there are physical limitations at Mare Island which seriously affect its development as a navy yard of the first order; that among these may be mentioned narrowness and limited area of water adjacent to the navy yard." With regard to this, the Carquinez Strait Station is better situated than any other navy yard in the country.

"Swift currents in Mare Island Strait." These currents are no swifter than at Portsmouth Navy Yard, Boston Navy Yard, New York Navy Yard, Norfolk Navy Yard; nor are they swifter than in other parts of San Francisco Bay.

"Wholly inadequate berthing spaces." This is true because the berthing spaces have not yet been built.

"No possibility of having such berthing spaces within reasonable range of repair shops."

All the berthing space required can easily be provided within reasonable range of repair shops.

"Difficulties of navigation." With the hundreds of ships that have come to Mare Island in the last 21 months there has not been one single case of difficulty.

"Effect of silt in the water, in clogging condenser and flushing system of the larger vessels."

This is incorrect and does not occur. Great Army transports, predreadnaughts, large cruisers, and other ships report no inconvenience of this kind. This is not judgment from three or four ships, but from many hundreds of ships.

Page 40, article 97, states that "in view of the conditions noted the commission is of the opinion that economical and physical limitations prevent the development of Mare Island beyond that necessary for building operations and the maintaining and repair of the vessels of the fleet which can be best maintained through and under the conditions of a 30-foot channel approach, etc." There is not a single disadvantageous condition noted but what can be overcome at but comparatively little expense. The channel approach is already practically at an average depth of 35 feet. Attention is invited to Appendix D, page 91, letter of the commandant of Mare Island dated October 7, 1916, in which it is stated that the only physical disadvantage of Mare Island as a navy yard and base for the fleet is the necessity of dredging to maintain a stipulated depth of water. At this time Captain Bennett, who was then commandant, had been commandant for 3½ years at Mare Island, and surely must have spoken with certainty.

Appendix F, page 108, Captain Bennett, then commandant of Mare Island, states that in his opinion it was not necessary to create another naval station. He states that with increased equipment, etc., Mare Island would be capable of serving the fleet as one of the main home bases.

In Appendix H, page 112, Civil Engineer Stanford reports in his letter of October 30, 1916, that repair facilities at Mare Island have been developed as far as desirable, because of channel and dry-dock limitations. Four years later, without any particular extension of Mare Island's repair facilities, there were four times as many men employed as at the time the letter was written, and last year there was a total expenditure by the Government at Mare Island of $60,000,000, which is probably more than four times as much money as was spent at the time Civil Engineer Stanford wrote. He mentions in this letter "five principal and very serious objections," as follows:

(1) INSUFFICIENT DEPTH OF WATER IN CHANNEL FROM SEA TO YARD.

This condition has been greatly changed from what it was in 1916.

(2) INADEQUATE FRESH-WATER SUPPLY.

The city of Vallejo has just voted bonds for $1,250,000 for a great water supply for the city and navy yard.

(3) INADEQUATE ANCHORAGE GROUND CONVENIENTLY CLOSE TO THE YARD.

No navy yard is so provided with adequate anchorage ground of space and depth as in the Carquinez Strait Station.

(4) INADEQUATE BERTHING SPACE CONVENIENTLY CLOSE TO SHOPS.

At that time there was an average of probably not more than 15 ships berthed at the yard. The highest number ever berthed then was 30. There is now, every day in the year, an average of more than 50 ships berthed at the yard. Berthing spaces need to be built, and there is ample space here to build them.

(5) NO DIRECT RAILROAD CONNECTION.

Hundreds of tons of freight come from the East over the railroad via Causeqay every night.

Mr. Stanford states that he does not consider the objections as stated above capable of correction. They are already corrected and do not exist.

On page 116 Civil Engineer Hollyday stated, in answer to question 2, certain objections to Mare Island. He considered only using the Mare Island Strait. He did not consider the Carquinez Strait docking station, projecting into Carquinez Strait. The creation of the big docking station at Carquinez Strait obviates every objection raised by Civil Engineer Hollyday.

In Appendix J, page 120, Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks Admiral Harris stated in his letter of October 9, 1916, that a "35-foot channel at mean low water can not be maintained through San Pablo Bay at a nonprohibitive cost." In answer to this, again it is accentuated that without reference to the navy yard and solely for commercial purposes a 35-foot channel at mean low water already practically exists and that the cost is much lower than originally estimated by the Army authorities. In fact, the dredger San Pablo, which is employed on this work, is for the greater part of the year employed on other work. And, further, that the Army officers in charge of this work have informed me that a 40-foot channel at mean low water 1,000 feet wide can be maintained at a lower cost than originally expected.

In Appendix J, page 121, Colonel Reese (C. E. C.) states: "There seems to be no reason to doubt that a channel 40 feet deep in San Pablo Bay could be maintained, etc., the cost gradually diminishing at the end of 10 years to a cost of about $65,000 a year."

In careful study and comment upon the Helm Board report I am impressed by the earnest study made by the Helm Board and the carefulness with which they went into every subject and their intention and desire to be fair, just, and impartial, but I have gone carefully through this report and believe I have mentioned every disadvantage stated by the Helm Board to exist against Mare Island. With regard to these alleged disadvantages the Helm Board studied them all, conferred with officers at Mare Island and questioned high authorities both in the Army and in the Navy.

The whole thing actually boils down to the question of the channel. There is no other objection stated that would have been an effective objection at that time had there been a deep-water channel and had the Helm Board believed that it was advisable to maintain the deep-water channel needed.

The Helm Board, in its investigations, found a number of advantages for Mare Island, stated on page 14, and which I will now bring to the attention of the congressional committee.

To begin with, it stated that the navy yard to be created must be equipped with additional facilities so that four times the amount of work then done—in 1916—might be accomplished. Attention is invited to the fact that in 1920, without additional facilities, Mare Island performed four times as much work as was done in 1916, and in doing this it has also become the most efficient and most economical navy yard of the country.

On page 15 it is stated that the commission recommends the "unquestionably fine, strategic location and easy defensibility of Mare Island."

Page 27, paragraph 64, "The navy yard is too far removed from the coast to be under gunfire from the open sea * * *. It is also particularly well protected against attack by a fleet and by land force, as it is well behind the coast fortifications near the entrance of San Francisco Bay and the mine fields at the entrance channel in the lower bay. The mountainous region between the navy yard and the coast also renders hostile movement toward it extremely difficult. In this respect Mare Island has great advantage over any location available for a navy yard on San Francisco Bay proper."

Page 28, paragraph 65, states that "the climatic conditions affecting labor efficiency are excellent. There is probably not another navy yard in the country where work is less interfered with by the weather. There is seldom excess of heat or cold. * * * Conditions in general are such as to permit of a full day's work being done on ship repair and construction on practically every day of the year. The officer at present in charge of the magazine made a special comment upon the beneficial effects of the climate in preventing powder deterioration. Severe storms are infrequent and do no marked damage. Fogs occur, but are not nearly so numerous or prolonged as farther down the bay."

Page 28, paragraph 66: "The water is of excellent quality, without scale-forming minerals, and suitable for all domestic and ordinary uses."

Page 28, paragraph 67: "The sanitary conditions of the station are excellent. These favorable conditions are greatly assisted by reason of the location and climate."

Page 30, paragraph 63: "The relations between labor and the yard administration appear to be close and sympathetic, a condition which is reflected in the efficient and economical work, as shown by the official records of comparative cost of work at this and other navy yards. This due in large part doubtless to the large number of workmen that look to the yard for permanent employment. Vallejo is the home of a large majority of them, receives its principal support by reason of the existence of the yard, and has grown as the need for workmen has grown."

Page 33, last paragraph: "The station of Mare Island is admirable, so far as regards strategic location."

Page 40, paragraph 99: "Advantages."

"(a) Land area sufficient for a first-class yard, including submarine and aviation base and the usual auxiliary activities of a naval base.

"(b) Defensibility excellent.

"(c) Climate excellent.

"(d) Water supply reliable thus far and capable of being increased.

"(e) Sanitary conditions excellent.

"(f) Transportation fair and capable of improvement.

"(g) Labor under ordinary conditions readily procurable in any quantity and of excellent quality.

"(h) Fuel (oil) easily obtainable and large supply near at hand.

"(i) Two excellent dry docks, the larger of which can accommodate more than 90 per cent of the vessels of the fleet as completed in 1921.

"(j) Plant equipment and general station utilities of good character and capable of effective improvement and extension for use of a large proportion of the vessels of the fleet.

"(k) Magazine facilities excellent.

"(l) Advantages always inherent in an extensive industrial and supply establishment in efficient and economical operation, and capable of reasonable extension to meet additional requirements of the fleet within the limitations imposed by depths of channel approaches."

Page 41, paragraph 101(c), states: "Mare Island has many advantages, due to defensive location, climate, labor supply, existing dry docks and shops, plant equipment, and various navy-yard exercises of great value and possible service to the fleet."

Appendix D, page 91, Captain Bennett, commandant of Mare Island Navy Yard, states in his letter of November 2, 1916, to the commission that "the advantages of Mare Island are its central location, mild climate, security from attack, available area for expansion, protected location from prevailing winds and storms, which make the docking and undocking of ships easy without regard to weather; spirit of cooperation between the yard and the city of Vallejo, which helps the administration materially and is an aid which does not exist in a large city."

On page 96 Captain Bennett states: "Climatic conditions will not interfere with work in the machinery division; sanitary condition is excellent."

Appendix F, page 109, letter from Captain Bennett dated October 16: "The logical, economical course undoubtedly lies in increasing the facilities of Mare Island and slightly extending its work and present organization to adequately serve as the 'main home base of the fleet.'"

Civil Engineer Stanford, in his letter of October 30, 1916, to the commission, stated that the principal advantages of Mare Island were:

"Strategically well located with regard to attacks from sea."

"Very favorable climatic conditions."

"Large undeveloped area of the yard which is available for improvement."

"Excellent labor supply."

"Well-equipped shops and other facilities required for new construction."

"Well-equipped shops and other facilities required for general repair work, etc."

"The yard is admirably adapted for the accumulation and storage of any quantity of supplies, which may be considered as necessary to meet emergency demands."

Civil Engineer R. C. Hollyday, in his letter of October 30, 1916, to the commission, says, on page 116:

"The principal advantages of the Mare Island Navy Yard are:

"(a) Strategical position of that yard."

"(b) The immense plant just installed there. I would not recommend the establishment of the navy yard at Mare Island if we had no establishment there at the present time."

"(c) Climatic advantages: I know of no yard or station belonging to the Government where the climate for the whole year is as nearly perfect as it is at Mare Island."

"(d) Its safety from attack by hostile forces: Its defense is especially strong, owing to the rugged shores north of San Francisco Bay."

"(e) Favorable labor conditions: A thriving town immediately across the creek from the yard, composed almost entirely of mechanics and laborers who work at Mare Island."

"(f) The record of the Mare Island Navy Yard in supplying vessels proves conclusively that it is a favorable place to build vessels."

On page 117: "There is sufficient land for almost any of the units which go to make up a first-class base, including marine barracks, recreation grounds, etc. The climatic conditions are better than at any other navy yard or station owned by the Government, as far as I have been able to observe. Sanitary conditions are good, but can be made better. Railroad and steamship lines are excellent. The fact that we have a very large naval establishment at Mare Island makes it extremely desirable that we use that plant to its fullest capacity and its greatest efficiency."

I believe that the above furnishes the commission with every disadvantage against Mare Island contained in the report of the Helm Board, and in all of the documents and letters that were submitted to the Helm Board, and also with the advantages as stated by the Helm Board.

Realizing that carefulness of the studies made by the Helm Board, and of its intent to be impartial, I intend no criticism on the ability or the sincerity of the board or any member of it when I say that the controlling disadvantage—lack of depth of water—which existed in 1916 is very different in 1920 than what it was at the time the Helm Board made its investigation and report. At that time the board judged that the limiting depth was 30 feet at low water.

To-day the depth maintained for commercial purposes, without cost to the Navy Department, over the San Pablo Shoal is practically 35 feet, with the statement of responsible Army engineers in charge that 40 feet is entirely feasible and practicable. The lack of sufficient depth of water is the great basis of criticism of Mare Island's possibilities. It is repeated, time and time again, and I wish to repeat it just as often as the statement is made, that this condition has entirely changed.

I will now ask the attention of the commission in regard to the Parks-McKean Board, dated October 20, 1919, and will give everything said referring to Mare Island:

"Mare Island.—The board recommends that no further effort be made to obtain or maintain depths beyond the natural depth of 26 feet; that Mare Island be retained as a hospital and magazine site, and that its industrial use be limited, after a new deep-water base is built, to ships drawing not more than 26 feet; and for such new construction work as may be assigned.

"The special board has used the very valuable report of the Helm Commission as a basis for all its investigations and reports.

"The board further agrees with the Helm Commission as to the inability of Mare Island for development as a first-class naval base.

"The board recommends that the Navy Department accept the natural conditions at Mare Island as limiting the practical depth which can be maintained, without extensive dredging, as 26 feet, and that only such further dredging along the quay wall and in front of the dry docks be done as will permit of their safe use for vessels drawing up to 30 feet, this dredging to continue for the use of ships until a deep-water base can be provided. The board is of the opinion that the department can not be justified in making further expenditure in an effort to obtain and maintain channels, turning basin, etc., necessary for the large ships of the fleet of to-day. The board agrees with the Helm Commission that Mare Island should be retained as a magazine and hospital site, and as an auxiliary to the deep-water base in San Francisco Bay, for both repair and new construction work."

The only criticism expressed in this report of the Parks-McKean Board against Mare Island's availibility as the naval base is based upon the assumed lack of the requisite depth in channel approach. It recommends that this channel be deemed as suitable for ships drawing not more than 26 feet, and states that further expenditure of dredging, etc., is not justified. This report is not justified by conditions of to-day, because the channel now practically averages 35 feet at low water and 41 feet at high water. A ship drawing more than 32 feet has been repeatedly through this channel without any inconvenience or trouble, and this criticism of Mare Island is not founded on the conditions that exist to-day. It is founded on conditions that existed in 1916, and which no longer hold. And further, it is again accentuated that this depth at low water of practically 35 feet is maintained for the purpose of commerce, toward which the Navy Department has never been asked to spend one cent.

It is my belief that the Carquinez Strait Station, with but comparatively little increased facilities, will provide every requisite deemed necessary for the fleet.

I now desire to call the attention of the commission to certain features in connection with the Mare Island Navy Yard which I believe are well worthy of consideration. We have at Mare Island a great navy yard. As a matter of fact, frankly it is the greatest navy yard and naval base that the country possesses to-day. It ranks actually second to New York in number of employees and in value of output, but, to count out certain industries located at the New York Navy Yard, such as the clothing factory, etc., it will probably be found that Mare Island ranks first. The Government has an investment here of book value in excess of $32,000,000. Its replacement value at present prices of labor and material would be many millions in excess of this. There is no part that is not working. The amount paid in wages between July 1, 1919, and July 1, 1920, the last fiscal year, was upward of $18,000,000. The amount of materials and supplies furnished by Mare Island to shops and ships was upward of $42,000,000. The total business of the yard was $60,000,000. This enormous amount means that one dollar out of every fifteen spent by the Navy Department at all naval stations on vessels of the Navy, at all training stations, at all private plants where Navy work is going on, in every bureau, and in every department, and all activities under them, was spent at Mare Island. In 1910 we thought we had a great Navy. That was the year after the fleet came back from its cruise around the world. We had then battleships, navy yards, and the same naval establishments, practically, that we have to-day, and the total expense for all these was $137,000,000. In other words, 10 years later the amount spent at Mare Island alone was nearly one-half of the total amount spent upon the entire Navy 10 years previously. In 1916 the Helm Board stated that the navy yard must be prepared to do four times as much work as it was doing in 1916, and for this many additional facilities would be required, and those additional facilities made the construction of a great naval base necessary. Mare Island Navy Yard three years later, without these additional facilities, did four times as much work as was done in 1916. This certainly should be strong evidence of Mare Island's abilities.

Further, in this connection attention is called to the appended blue prints, made up at Mare Island from official Government reports, showing Mare Island to be the most efficient and economical navy yard the Government has under its orders to-day; that the Government gets more for a dollar spent at Mare Island than at any other navy yard in the country. Recently, by a Navy Department report, there were 497 ships in active commission in the Navy, 114 of which were officially based for repairs, supplies, upkeep, etc., on Mare Island.

As a matter of fact, because of its great facilities and capacities and central position, many other ships based on other navy yards have had their repairs and upkeep done at Mare Island. With 12 navy yards under the Government, one-fourth of all the ship work is done at Mare Island. Carquinez Strait Station is a great naval base, the greatest in the country, because it handles more ships, repairs them, keeps them, loads them than any other two navy yards in the country combined. It certainly has a better climate than any other navy yard. The men are not paralyzed by heat in the summer time nor numbed by the cold in the winter time. The records of the yard show that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, at Mare Island there were 201 vessels of all classes repaired, having a total displacement of 494,134 tons, of an indicated horsepower of 2,175,124, and of a total cost of $156,549,214. That the total expenditures for that year for salaries, wages, etc., by the disbursing officer, were $18,198,034.29; the total value of supplies and materials issued by the supply officer to shops and ships was $42,068,272.40. Therefore, in the year ending June 30, 1920, the total expenditures at Mare Island were $60,266,306.69. According to the Helm Board report, the total vessels—of what grade is not given—based on the two Pacific navy yards in the year 1916, was 57; the displacement, 233,850 tons; the indicated horsepower, 440,000. This shows that for the year ending June 30, 1920, Mare Island repaired more than three times as many ships as were based on both Mare Island and Puget Sound in 1916; that the displacement of the ships repaired at Mare Island alone, in the year ending June 30, 1920, was more than twice as much as for both Mare Island and Puget Sound in 1916. That the horsepower of these ships repaired at Mare Island in the year ending June 30, 1920, was five times as much as the total horsepower of the two yards in 1916. That the first cost of these ships was twice as much as the first cost of the ships repaired at both yards in 1916. It is believed that this is striking evidence of Mare Island's ability to meet increased demands of enormous scope.

The following is offered as evidence that the spirit animating the Mare Island workmen is not equaled by the spirit existing at any navy yard in the country:

At the Victory Liberty loan in 1919 the Navy Department urged all navy yards to compete for four pennants of honor, that were to be presented by the Navy Department to the yards excelling in certain particular features. One pennant of honor was to be presented to that yard which had the greatest total amount of subscriptions; a second pennant of honor to that yard which had the greatest percentage of employees subscribing; a third pennant of honor to that navy yard which showed the greatest total per capita subscription.

The fourth pennant of honor was to be given to that navy yard which influenced the greatest amount of outside subscriptions. It would have been a great honor for any navy yard to have won any one of these pennants of honor. After the returns were all in the department presented Mare Island with the first pennant of honor, because of all navy yards Mare Island had the greatest total amount subscribed for Victory bonds. The Navy Department presented the second pennant of honor to Mare Island, because 100 per cent of all employees bought Liberty bonds. Every single employee subscribed to one or more bonds. The third pennant of honor was awarded by the Navy Department to Mare Island, because it had the greatest total per capita subscription of employees, the per capita subscription being $225, the nearest competitor averaging $138 per capita. The fourth pennant of honor was presented to the Philadelphia Navy Yard, for influencing the greatest total amount of outside subscriptions, Mare Island ranking second. This must be conclusive proof of the spirit animating Mare Island.

At the same time the California State authorities asked the Mare Island organization to take charge of the subscriptions for Solano County. In previous Liberty loans Solano County had never equaled her prescribed quota and had always stood at the last of all California counties. Under Mare Island management, in the fifth Liberty loan, Solano County led the list of all California counties with a subscription of 219 per cent of her quota. Mare Island spirit has been shown constantly.

Another example of this was the launching of the destroyer Ward 17½ days after her keel was laid, and her completion in 108 days. The fact that of destroyers built at Mare Island 16 of them cost the Government $250,000 less for each destroyer than the cost of destroyers built at any other navy yard or in a private plant is another example. Incidentally, it may be said that Mare Island destroyers have made the fastest speed (and the matter of speed is all important to a destroyer) made by any destroyer ever built in this country or in any country. The Boggs made 35.6 knots an hour, about 42 miles an hour.

The quality of Mare Island product has been repeatedly commended. Mare Island workmen live mostly in the city of Vallejo, which is immediately adjacent. The city has no other interest except one flour mill employing perhaps 200 hands. The city is absolutely devoted to the navy yard. The interests of Mare Island are its interests. This has brought about a unity of feeling that is entirely to the benefit of the Navy Department. There are no strikes or walkouts. There are no other places where Mare Island men can get employment. Terms of perfect confidence and sympathy exist between the management of the navy yard, the workmen, and the city of Vallejo. Put this naval base at Alameda or at Hunters Point and the workmen would live in all sorts of places, some far and some near. This unity of purpose and achievement would undoubtedly be much depreciated. As an organization the workmen would be lost after they left the naval base if close to a big city.

Summing up, it may be stated that conditions to-day are different than they were in 1916. There are no difficulties of navigation that would worry an experienced navigator. The swift currents spoken of are not particularly swift and do not disqualify Carquinez Strait Station. They exist in other places in the bay. The berthing spaces are inadequate but capable of whatever extension may be needed. The muddy bottom is of no objection. The water area is unlimited in Carquinez Strait, and the water area in Mare Island Strait provides the finest fitting-out basin possessed by any navy yard. The anchorage ground is ample. Supplies are nearer to Mare Island by hours than either Alameda or Hunters Point. There is practically a depth of 35 feet at low water over Pinole Shoal, 41 feet at high water, and it is practicable and feasible to maintain this depth at 40 feet at low water if desired.

Mare Island is the most efficient and most economical navy yard and station possessed by the Government to-day. An expenditure of $26,000,000 will enable it to take care of every need of the superdreadnaughts.

Further, Commander Cox states that if funds and complete authority were available he would build a dry dock at Carquinez Strait Station and be ready to dock a superdreadnaught 24 months after work was begun.

This, Senators and Representatives, covers what I wish to say. The technical information, costs, etc., will be furnished by Commander Cox, who had the vision to conceive the possibilities of Mare Island if developed into the Carquinez Strait Station, and who is the creator and designer of the proposed extension of Mare Island.

APPENDIX No. 2.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. L. M. COX BEFORE THE JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

Gentlemen of the commission, the commandant has submitted a very able presentation of the merits of the present location of the Mare Island Navy Yard as the site for a new and enlarged Pacific coast naval base. My function is merely to place at your disposal the results of such technical studies as I have made during my tour of duty in this district, and in particular to give you my reasons as an engineer for recommending the so-called Carquinez Strait site. Considering the limited time at the commission's disposal for personal investigation at the various sites, I am of the opinion that I could best present that part of the subject falling within my sphere through the medium of questions and answers. Since, however, it appears desirable to present a more general statement of the technical side of the question, I will endeavor to touch only upon the more important features, leaving all questions of details to be brought out by examination, should the commission desire more specific information.

Assuming that Congress is convinced of the necessity for an adequate docking, repair, and supply base on the Pacific coast for the maintenance of the Pacific Fleet, it follows that before giving the necessary authority for the construction of such a base and before appropriating the large sums necessary for its execution a definite decision must be reached regarding its location. There are two governing factors in the problem of locating a naval base—military requirements and engineering features.

Obviously, I could not well have spent 20 years of my life in the naval service without giving first place in any discussion of a naval public work to the question of military needs, and possibly, too, some more or less positive ideas as to what such needs may be for any specific problem. My knowledge is not that of a specialist, however, and since the commission has at its disposal the best expert talent in the service it is my desire to avoid this topic altogether, both in my preliminary statement and in my examination.

The factor of "engineering" I assume as including practicability of construction, practicability of operation, and all engineering questions having to do with the economics, both of construction and operation; and I will start with the hypothesis that if it be established to the commission's satisfaction that the Carquinez Strait location reasonably fulfills all military requirements which can now be foreseen the commission's choice of site will be that which can be operated at the least annual expense and which will conserve the maximum of existing Government investments.

The act creating this commission specifically mentions for consideration three proposed sites known as the Alameda site, the Hunters Point site, and the Carquinez Strait site. I will discuss briefly the general characteristics of the three sites in the order mentioned.

The Alameda site consists of a tract of water-covered land with a bay frontage of approximately 8 miles and an area of approximately 5,400 acres. The present surface elevation of this tract is from zero at the tideland to minus 12 feet, or, say, an average of 6 feet below mean lower low water. Of this tract it is proposed by the Helm Board to develop immediately for dockyard construction a quadrangle containing approximately 473 acres, or about 9 per cent of the entire tract. This development plot will require an average fill of about 20 feet in order to bring it to a yard level of 12 feet above mean lower low water, the material for this fill to be obtained from dredging. Exploratory work has been in progress for some months with a view to ascertaining the character of the underlying materials for foundation purposes.

The results of the borings taken in the course of this work have been submitted to the commission, and will be interpreted by the commission's technical advisers. For purposes of this statement they may be interpreted as indicating exceedingly treacherous conditions for the construction of such structures as dry docks. We have penetrated in places to a depth of 150 feet, and in every boring we have encountered clays and sands of different mixtures, with water-bearing strata well within the bottom depths of a modern dry dock carrying 40 feet of water over the sill. This means difficult, hazardous, and expensive construction work, and I believe that I am warranted in expressing the opinion that it would be unwise to attempt such constructions at this site without resorting to radical measures, such as were adopted in the construction of the Pearl Harbor Dry Dock; and I would not consider it safe to estimate the cost of such a dock at less than $5,700,000.

Mr. HICKS. Will you please repeat that figure, Commander Cox?

Commander COX. Five million seven hundred thousand dollars. After a study of local labor and material markets extending over a period of a year and a quarter, I have prepared what I believe to be a fairly reliable estimate of the cost of executing the Helm Board layout on the Alameda site, and find that the total, including reclamation, dredging, quay walls, piers, buildings, dry docks, breakwaters, machine equipment, and public utilities, could not be proved for less than $50,427,000, and that, assuming the usual procedure on Government works and the usual contract methods, the time required to complete the entire work, with the maximum rate of progress to be expected, is six years, with a strong probability of exceeding this period. (Of course, this information has come to me secondhand; because I have not been here long enough to actually know.) When constructed, the maintenance and operating costs should be reasonable. Silt drops rapidly in this locality, and I am informed that the rate of deposit sometimes amounts to as much as 3 inches per month, or 3 feet per year, when the bank is once disturbed and the current paths deflected by wing walls. This will mean periodical dredging for the maintenance of slips and approach, but the cost of this work should not be given weight as an important site objection, since the disadvantage is more or less common to all sites on the bay.

The railroad service may be marked excellent, sources of supply excellent, labor conditions ample as regards supply, but unsatisfactory in other respects.

At the Hunters Point site it is proposed to reclaim an area of approximately 291 acres of submerged land, a considerable portion of which is at an average depth of 5 feet below mean low water, and to excavate a portion of the rock bluff in order to permit of the construction of dry docks, as indicated on the Helm Board's layout. From the result of recent borings it would seem highly desirable to increase the rock excavation quantities as estimated by the Helm Board, in order to shift the dry docks farther to the westward, and thus insure solid rock support throughout their entire bottom areas.

When the location is so shifted, the foundation conditions at Hunters Point may be classed as excellent. There are, of course, comparatively large amounts of fill, rock excavation, and of rock and sand-clay dredging, and while these items add somewhat to the cost, the net result is a distinct advantage. Everything required for a naval base would have to be included in the initial project, as the property is now unimproved, and it is the opinion of all officers with whom I have consulted that the existing privately owned docks belonging to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation should not be acquired by the Government, but should be encouraged as a commercial activity necessary for the port and available for the Navy in time of war. As in the case of the Alameda site, I have made a fairly close estimate—omitting the cost of real estate—of the entire project, in the light of present market conditions, and submit as my opinion that it could be constructed at a cost of $49,359,000, and assuming the most favorable conditions for expediting Government work of this character, together with the usual contract procedure, the work could be completed in from four and one-half to five years. If these assumptions are not realized, this period will be very considerably exceeded. I am assuming wholesale operations, such as were adopted for the Panama Canal, in estimating my time.

Transportation facilities are satisfactory, sources of supply excellent, and labor conditions about the same as at Alameda.

For the Carquinez Strait site no definite layout of docks and piers has yet been adopted by any sanctioned authority. Since I first proposed this site in my report of July, 1919, I have made a number of tentative layouts, and some rough comparative studies as to cost; but inasmuch as all layouts involving an outboard location of dry docks must necessarily await the results of borings now in progress,

I have, for the purposes of estimating, adopted a layout affording a rock foundation for dry docks, which I will show you, marked "Scheme E." In this layout I have indicated for immediate construction the same general water-front and dry-dock facilities as were adopted by the Helm Board, but—as did the Helm Board at the other sites—besides the two docks, I have indicated by dotted lines locations for two additional docks which I believe will ultimately become necessary for the proper and expeditious upkeep of the fleet. The two docks indicated for present construction are founded on rock, and one of them has its prism entirely within rock. The piers extend to or beyond the present 35-foot-depth contour, and the intervals between piers, together with the entrances to dry docks, are to be dredged to 40 feet below mean low water. Because of the availability of existing shop facilities at the Mare Island Navy Yard, no buildings are included in this layout beyond an additional storehouse, a power substation, and sheds for outside machinist and dock gear. The station would be served by a railroad loop connecting, via the causeway, with transcontinental railroad lines, and public utilities would be served from Mare Island sources. I estimate the cost of executing this entire work at $27,916,000. Assuming the usual Government methods, the work should be completed within three years, and one dock could be opened for service two years after the beginning of actual construction.

It should be borne in mind that the above estimate includes the initial cost of deepening the channel through Pinole Shoal, which now averages 35 feet in depth by 500 feet in width, to 40 feet in depth by 1,000 feet in width, as well as an item to cover the cost of removing the ammunition depot from its present location to the reclaimed area near the northern limits of the yard reservation.

I might say, parenthetically, that I do not believe a channel as wide as 1,000 feet is necessary, but I have included the cost of such a channel in order to place beyond doubt its practicability for use by capital ships.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that by the adoption of the Carquinez Strait site there will be saved to the Government approximately $22,500,000, as compared with the cost of the Helm Board layout at Alameda, and approximately $21,400,000, as compared with the cost of the same board's layout at Hunters Point. There will also be saved the equivalent of the capitalized value of the administration expense at an additional and distant station, which may be evaluated as an investment equivalent to $50,000,000, if the annual cost of administration of the separate station be placed at $2,000,000, and the Government's rate of interest be 4 per cent. If the new base is located at either of the lower bay sites, one of two results must follow. The Mare Island Navy Yard will be retained in operation as a base adjunct, or it will be abandoned—no other alternative exists. If Mare Island continues to operate, the capitalized value of the annual cost of administering it, added to the excess in first cost of the additional station, will bring the total sum to $70,000,000. If Mare Island be abandoned, its present value—estimated at $35,000,000—added to the excess cost of the new station, will make the total increase in investment $55,000,000. The obligation of either sum is a matter of sufficient importance to justify the most searching and exhaustive consideration of any alternate plan which offers even a promise of achieving some measure of greater economy.

Obviously, no anticipated saving, no matter how great, would justify a project which, when completed, would be impracticable from the operating standpoint. It remains to be established, therefore, whether or not the Carquinez Strait Station, if in existence, would be approachable and usable with convenience by capital ships.

* * * * * * *

Some 16 months have elapsed since my report was submitted, and I see no reason for changing or modifying any opinion expressed therein. There have been various objections raised by advocates of other sites, but with the exception of this one they are either wholly insignificant or are of such small moment as to warrant me in ignoring them in a general statement. Again, I am excluding the question of military needs. There is, however, one objection to the Carquinez Strait site which demands serious attention. I refer to the stretch of shoal water across San Pablo Bay and between the south end of Mare Island and Pinole Point, known as "Pinole Shoals." The Helm Board's condemnation of Mare Island, as far as it may have been influenced by the evil reputation of Pinole Shoal, was justified by the evidence before it. I now request the commission to consider my next statement in the light of new evidence. At the time of the sittings of the Helm Board in 1916 there had been no consistent attempts to provide and maintain an adequate channel through Pinole Shoal. Under the authority of Congress the War Department started work on a channel 30 feet deep by 500 feet wide in 1916. The authorizing act also provided for the construction of a dredge to be devoted exclusively to the maintenance of this channel. Prior to this time engineers both in the Army and Navy had expressed the opinion that the maintenance of such a channel was of doubtful practicability. The work was completed in 1917–18, and since that time the channel has not only been maintained for 40 per cent less than the estimated annual cost but has actually been deepened considerably beyond the authorized depth, and the specially constructed dredge has not been used on Pinole Shoal for more than 60 per cent of its time. The result is that to-day this channel which was designed for a depth of 30 feet has a controlling depth of 32.8 feet and averages 35 feet below mean lower low water.

It must therefore be apparent not only to professional engineers but to the layman that the maintenance of a channel 35 feet deep throughout is no longer a problem but a demonstrated certainty, and it is the opinion of all experts whom I have consulted, including at least three different Army engineers, who have been in charge of the first San Francisco district, that it is entirely practicable to provide and to maintain at reasonable expense a channel 40 feet deep and 500 feet wide, or, if desired, a 40-foot channel of twice the width, or 1,000 feet wide, as has been included in my estimates of cost. It may not be out of place to state that the War Department has already authorized under existing funds the improvement of Pinole Shoal to 35 feet depth throughout, which work is now under way, and that in accordance with the estimates of the district engineer, Col. E. E. Winslow, C. E., United States Army, as contained in his letter of July 7, 1920: "It is expected with these funds that there will result a gradual increase in the width of this channel to not less than 600 feet, and not improbably eventually to 800 feet." In this connection the commission's attention is invited to the enlarged chart of Pinole Shoal on which I have indicated the soundings in colors. Those shown in red are less than 35 feet, while those in green exceed 35 feet, and it will be noted that the depths in some cases now exceed 38 feet below mean lower low water.

It must be apparent to the commission that provision of a 40-foot depth, and any reasonable width throughout Pinole Shoal is, as was stated in effect by the Helm Board in its report, a perfectly practical proposition and an engineering question only.

It is, however, of interest to the commission to determine just what constitutes a reasonable and justifiable annual maintenance expenditure. This, of course, the commission is competent to do for itself, but it may be proper to point out the obvious principle that any annual expenditure which, when capitalized at the Government's borrowing rate and added to the initial cost of the project, will result in a sum appreciably less than the saving in money to be expected from the improvement is, according to business standards, justifiable. Applying this principle, the annual maintenance cost of a 40-foot by 500-foot channel, as estimated by the district engineer, is $150,000, and the Government's borrowing rate may be assumed at 4 per cent. The equivalent investment would therefore be $3,750,000. The estimated initial cost of such a channel, as given by the district engineer, is $1,250,000, and the saving which I estimate will result from the adoption of the Carquinez Strait site is, say, $20,000,000, or nearly four times the initial and capitalized maintenance cost. If the same criterion is applied to the scheme for a 40-foot by 1,000-foot channel it will be found that the saving is over two times the real and equivalent investment.

The practicability of navigating such a channel as I have assumed in inclement weather and in the fogs which are prevalent throughout the bay is, of course, a question regarding which my opinion must necessarily carry little weight. Nevertheless, it may not be out of place to state that the saving to be effected by the adoption of Carquinez Strait site would more than justify the comparatively small expense of completely fencing in both boundaries of the channel with electrically lighted spar buoys at intervals as short as the length of the smallest craft using it. If, with such a channel, the occasional fogs and occasional winds in this locality would materially interfere with its use by capital ships, then, unquestionably, serious consideration should be given to the abandonment of practically all of our existing naval stations.

In this connection attention should be invited to the fact that there are relatively fewer fog days in the year in San Pablo Bay than in the lower bay and that the velocities of currents in San Pablo Bay are in general less than in the lower bay. It is admitted that any ships entering the Golden Gate would have to traverse the San Pablo Bay fogs in addition to the lower bay fogs; nevertheless it must be an advantage to have fewer fog days in the anchorage immediately off the docking depot. There are winds in San Pablo Bay, but they are the same afternoon trades that are to be found in every locality on the bay. There are swift currents off the proposed docking depot water front, but they are not, as seems to be generally supposed, the swift currents of Carinquez Strait gorge, and, so far as observations taken during the past year permit us to judge, they do not materially exceed the current velocities off Hunters Point or between San Francisco and Goat Island. On the other hand, the Carquinez Strait site is the only site on San Francisco Bay which is afforded even a moderate protection from the southeast gales which have been so often destructive to shipping in the lower bay.

I would like to state this, that I have spent a great deal of time personally at every site on the bay, and feel that I am competent to express an opinion concerning prevailing and casual wind contingents.

Labor conditions at Mare Island are considered by every industrial officer who has been on duty at that station during the past few years as approaching the ideal, in that the yard activities constitute the only labor-employing establishment within the district. Labor depends upon the yard, and once it invests its earnings in homes it is prone to become permanently domiciled. The yard now draws labor from three thriving towns, and with the establishment of the Carquinez Strait depot it will unquestionably attract, by means of a direct seven-minute ferry, additional labor from the Contra Costa side. It will be free from the unsettled labor conditions of the larger cities on the lower bay, and will then, as now, benefit by the wonderful community spirit of its employees.

It would seem unnecessary to comment upon the railroad situation, but in order to make this statement complete I will invite your attention to the fact that the natural entrance to the bay district for northern and central transcontinental lines is through the Carquinez Canyon, and the two southern transcontinental lines have physical connections which give them also a terminal route through this canyon. With the causeway connection in commission, it will be seen that the Mare Island yard and the Carquinez Strait docking depot will have an all-land connection to every transcontinental railroad in the United States.

In conclusion I desire to state most emphatically that I am in no sense an advocate for the Mare Island yard. I have no interest in presenting the Carquinez Bay project other than my interest in the naval service and in the Government, and, as a matter of fact, it is my justifiable ambition as district public works officer to build the base wherever it may be located.

I am already on record with the department as desiring above all things a naval base on the Pacific in the shortest possible time and to the effect that, while I see no reason to change my opinions as submitted in my report of July, 1919, I would be only too glad to concur in any final decision which may be rendered by competent authority in order to get the base. With the shifting of the probable theater of war from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it must be apparent, first, that we want such a base badly; and, second, that we want it in the shortest possible time. I might add, from the standpoint of the taxpayer, that we want it at the least possible expense. None of these considerations would justify the selection of an unsuitable site from a military standpoint, but, granted that military requirements are satisfied by the site I propose, as I sincerely believe them to be, I would surely be derelict in my duty as an officer and a public servant were I to fail to point out the very appreciable saving to the Government in time and in money attainable by the adoption of the Carquinez Strait site for the proposed naval base of the Pacific.

I have in this statement attempted to outline briefly and in a very general manner the project I propose. I am now prepared to answer to the best of my ability any questions you may wish to put to me and to go into all engineering and cost features with such detail as you may deem advisable. As you are doubtless aware, I have had at my disposal neither the funds nor the authority for the preparation of design drawings or the inauguration of actual construction estimates, of quantities or costs, but I believe I am able to give you such preliminary data as may be reasonably expected at this stage of your work.

APPENDIX 3.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. H. M. GLEASON.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, first of all I want to preface my remarks by saying that I will make them very brief. I had intended to make a statement similar to what Captain Beach and Commander Cox have already made, but as they have covered the ground so thoroughly I feel that it would be an imposition on you gentlemen to repeat, practically duplicating, what they have said.

I thoroughly agree with what Captain Beach has said and with what Commander Cox has said, and I congratulate them on the way in which they have presented the information. It is very complete and is matter of record, so that it can be easily referred to.

Pardon me if I say just a few words in regard to myself to explain my connection with this occasion. Having been on duty at this yard for almost the past 10 years and concerned with the construction of vessels and with the problems that we have had here, I feel that I have arrived at the conclusion which I have through experience and through a conviction which I can not change.

Now, I would like to say that I have no material interest in Vallejo or in California. I own not a dollar's worth of property and am not interested in it except as an ex-officer of the service who has had experience here and who is vitally interested as a private citizen paying taxes. I am associated with a firm with which Capt. Harry George is also associated—the former commandant of this yard. For business reasons he could not be here. But he authorizes me to say for him what his opinion is in reference to Mare Island, and I will quote his own words.

Captain George, I might say, was our war commandant here, a man of great activity and great ability, and the work the yard did during the war was in great measure due to his administration. I am very proud, indeed, to have been one of his staff here during the war. Captain George says, and I will quote his words: "I have always been entirely in favor of the development of Mare Island and the concentration of all naval activity at that point." Those words are quoted from words he gave me.

As I say, I am not going to go into a lengthy statement after the very excellent presentation that has been made here by Captain Beach and Commander Cox, but there are a few things that I would like to say, based on the experience I have had here.

The question of navigation has been brought up. I do not pose as an expert on navigation, and I am not. But we see the results of navigation here at the yard, and have in the past 10 years, in the bringing up of ships for dockings. During the time I have been here I think we have docked something like 1,500 ships of various sizes, large and small, and during that time there has been not one single serious delay in getting a ship to the dry dock, through all kinds of weather, fog included. That speaks for the navigation of ships. Also, while I am on the same subject, no material interference with the docking schedule owing to weather conditions. I believe you will agree that that is a very good record for 10 years, and involving something over 15 years, during which there has been no serious interference with the docking of vessels on account of navigation or weather conditions.

The criticism has also been made regarding berthing space. There is, of course, no berthing space here, because no material improvement has been made in berthing facilities at Mare Island, as the record will show, since the days of wooden ships, and it is quite natural that the berthing facilities are wanting at the present time for ships of the present-day type.

The efficiency of labor here at this yard I feel that I have the right to express an opinion upon, and I believe that the Government gets more for its dollar expended at Mare Island than at any other navy yard. The records of the Navy Department demonstrate that, and I am firmly convinced in my own mind that the Government does get, and will continue to get, through the excellent spirit that prevails here owing to the local conditions, better value than they would or do at any other station.

I hope the other stations will develop the efficiency that Mare Island has developed, for the sake of getting more return for the money invested in a naval establishment. Now, the question of the docking station to the main repair station: The docking of ships, such as is proposed at the docking station, is a function which requires the coming and going of large ships, their supply, and the minor repairs. It is of distinct advantage to have a docking station that is not absolutely tied up with your industrial center, so that the ships may come and go in their docking and quick overhaul work at a station which is all under the same administrative control and under the same supervisory control that the main plant is. In docking in that way you will not interfere with the other work in progress—the major overhaul work or construction work or work of that kind. So I consider it of distinct advantage to have a docking station conveniently located, as this is proposed to be, and not be interfering with your activities at your main repair plant.

There is another point that I would like to bring up, and that is the question of dollars and cents. That is an all-important point in business, as I am finding out, and it is the all-important point in connection with the Government business. It will be more so from now on, as I take it from the various things I hear in the conduct of life, that the expenditure of money by the Government has got to be curtailed, and therefore it is up to the people, their representatives, and all of us, to do what we can to conserve the moneys expended in the various activities of the Government. So I say the question of money is of first importance, outweighing all others, and, in comparing the proposed layout here with any other docking station, such as at Alameda or at Hunters Point, Commander Cox has very succinctly and very clearly placed it before you, and I would like to emphasize only one or two points that he has made. First, assuming that $60,000,000 is the cost of a new plant at Alameda or Hunters Point, and I think that is a very conservative estimate, and before you get through with a project of that kind you will probably spend $80,000,000 or more in it and its development as time goes on; assuming that, remember what you have got to do to operate a separate plant. Just the minute you establish a separate plant and establishment you obligate yourself to the operating expenses which, in a commercial business, is of first consideration. What is it going to cost you to run it?

Now, a conservative estimate of the overhead expense of running a separate establishment down the bay, away from Mare Island, would be about $2,000,000. That I think a very conservative figure. If you capitalize $2,000,000 at 4 per cent, you have a capital investment of $50,000,000, or at 5 per cent, of $40,000,000. Therefore, as a business proposition, you have got to include that figure. Now, when you add that $40,000,000, and I will take it at 5 per cent, I will say you have to borrow money at 5 per cent to make it as unfavorable as possible—$40,000,000 represents your capitalized investment on operating expenses, and with $60,000,000 as your first cost added to it, it amounts to $100,000,000, in round numbers. You balance against that what you have to expend at Mare Island to get the same thing. At Mare Island you have your repair plant, which, with slight modifications, can be made to meet the situation, and you have an estimated cost which Commander Cox has given you, I think he said, $3,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. CURRY. Twenty-seven million dollars.

Commander GLEASON. Well, I will say $30,000,000. That is a direct expenditure which goes against this expenditure of $60,000,000 down below.

Now, of course, in handling these added appliances, the docking station, etc., that would necessarily mean an increase in the operating expenses of Mare Island as a unit, combined with the Carquinez Strait station; it would naturally increase the operating expenses. I have made a conservative estimate of $500,000, and I capitalize that at the same borrowing rate as representing an investment of $10,000,000. Add that to your $30,000,000 and you have $40,000,000 as the amount represented in the business sense in the Mare Island and Carquinez Strait proposition. Put that against your $100,000,000, and you have a difference of $60,000,000. That, in plain horse sense, business sense, is what another project down the bay amounts to. It amounts to a criminal expenditure of the people's money of $60,000,000. That, to my mind, is the controlling factor in the whole situation.

And I would like to add, in conclusion, that in my service here at Mare Island I feel proud of the fact that I have been connected with the organization, and I don't think I would have been where I am to-day, at the prime of life, if I had not been connected with such an efficient organization.

Senator BALL. Are there any questions?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I would like to ask the commander a question or two. Commander, you are not a military man, are you? You are a civil engineer?

Commander GLEASON. I was educated in the Naval Academy as a naval man, and then in construction work. I am an engineer of naval architecture.

Mr. BRITTEN. I was rather surprised to hear you say that the one controlling factor, the predominant issue, in this matter is the expenditure of money. Do you really mean that literally—that that is really more important than the desirable military advantages?

Commander GLEASON. That is, assuming that you could get all the requirements of a naval base at Mare Island.

Mr. BRITTEN. You didn't say that. All the military advantages being equal, then?

Commander GLEASON. Not equal; no.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, the expenditure would be the controlling feature if all the military advantages were equal. But you didn't say that. I just wanted to get your opinion. Then, supposing there were some military advantages in any one of the other sites. How would you weigh that as against the expenditure of money?

Commander GLEASON. Well, I would say that it would have to have considerable weight to counterbalance $60,000,000. That is a pretty heavy consideration.

COMMUNICATION FROM CAPT. DUDLEY W. KNOX, UNITED STATES NAVY, SUBMITTED BY HON. C. F. CURRY, REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE THIRD CALIFORNIA DISTRICT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1920.

Joint Senate and House Committee on Naval Bases on the Pacific Coast.

GENTLEMEN: Inclosed I am presenting for your information and to be printed as a part of the hearings at Mare Island on naval-base sites on San Francisco Bay and Carquinez Straits a copy of a telegram giving the opinion of Capt. Dudley W. Knox, United States Navy.

Captain Knox is at present commanding officer of the U. S. S. Brooklyn, and has studied San Francisco Bay and its contiguous waters thoroughly. He was a member of Admiral Sims's staff during the recent war, holds a Naval War College diploma, was a member of the staff of the Naval War College, and was three times awarded the Naval Institute medal. He is considered one of the great strategists in the United States Navy.

Sincerely yours,

C. F. CURRY,
Member Congress, Third California District.

[Copy—Western Union telegram.]

VALLEJO, CALIF., December 14, 1920.

Congressman C. F. CURRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Following military study just received from eminent authority; believe it excellent and extremely important to place before commission at once. Original going forward by mail to-day.

"Comparison between Alameda, Hunters Point, and Carquinez sites for a naval docking and repair station from the (1) military, and (2) seaman's viewpoint. Preliminary to any detailed consideration it is desirable to formulate a conception of the functions of a San Francisco Bay naval base, and the scope of its activities in a war in the Pacific. Such a war will assume one of two general characters: (1) A strategic offensive, requiring our fleet to undertake a mid-Pacific or a trans-Pacific campaign, and (2) a strategic defensive necessitating the retention of our fleet in home waters to combat a superior enemy on our own coast. In either case San Francisco Bay will necessarily become the main assembly and mobilization point—owing to its location, railroad connections, and the size of protected anchorage afforded. Other Pacific coast ports may be utilized for fleet detachments, but the fleet as a whole must be served primarily by San Francisco Bay considered as a whole. A great number of vessels must be assembled, including fuel ships and other auxiliaries; probably the entire anchorage ground in the bay will be occupied. The function of the base will be to serve this armada primarily in regard to (1) furnishing fuel and supplies; (2) fitting out; (3) docking and major repairs. (Minor repairs will be done by repair shops and ships' own crews.) During the progress of an offensive campaign carried into mid-Pacific or beyond, San Francisco Bay will continue to be a primary supply terminal, at which great numbers of supply ships will call constantly for cargoes and a small percentage of both supply ships and fighting ships will require the services of the docking and repair station at all times. During the continuance of a defensive campaign the fleet as a whole is likely to spend much time at anchor within San Francisco, ready to sail on a few hours' notice.

"Under the latter conditions the demand for large quantities of fuel and other supplies will be constant, but the percentage of ships requiring docking and major repair service at any one time will be small. It is further desirable to examine the relationship between the above primary functions of the base and the precise location of the docking and repair station. A glance at the map will indicate the impracticability of supplying efficiently from one point a fleet extending from off Benicia to the vicinity of Palo Alto—an anchorage ground 50 miles in length.

Necessarily the Government will utilize nearly all the commercial distributing facilities in the bay to supply fuel and other stores to such a fleet. Obviously such a supply system will have no vitally direct connection with the docking and repair station and need not be located at such station. In so far as meeting this fleet need is concerned, the precise location of the docking and repair station is not affected vitally. As a matter of fact confusion of thought will be avoided by regarding the docking and repair station not as the base but in its true rôle as merely one unit of the base. For fitting out, docking, and major repairs only a small portion of the fleet will require service at any one time, for which purposes they will take up temporary berths alongside or near the docking and repair station.

"Considering that the Grand Fleet at its principal operating base during the war (Scapa Flow) was 200 miles from its principal docking and repair base (Rosyth) it should be apparent that the precise location within San Francisco Bay of the docking and repair base is inconsequential in so far as serving the fleet in these capacities is concerned. Hence it is apparent that the precise location of the main docking and repair station on San Francisco Bay bears no close relationship to the ability of such a station to fulfill its primary functions of (1) fitting out, (2) docking and major repairs, and the location of the docking and repair station is still further unrelated to the function of supplying the active fleet. It is only necessary that the site chosen shall satisfy (1) engineering, (2) industrial, (3) military, and (4) seamanship requirements. The two former are outside the scope of this paper. Since the sites at Alameda and Hunters Point possess virtually the same advantages and disadvantages from the military and seamanship aspects, they will be considered herein jointly as lower bay sites.

"1. Military aspects: The military questions regarding the precise location of a docking and repair station upon San Francisco Bay pertain exclusively to security against enemy action; such action may take the form of—

"(a) Bombardment from seaward: The lower bay sites are within easy bombardment ranges of the largest naval calibers from positions off a long stretch of coast.

"The Carquinez site is considerably better protected both on account of its greater distance from the coast and of the shelter of higher land. The general question of the feasibility of effective bombardment of fortified shore positions from seaward has been debatable for many years. The problem is affected materially by such questions as (1) the relative range and power of the shore and ships' batteries; (2) the relative strength of the opposing aerial forces; (3) protection given the port by mines and submarines; and (4) conditions of visibility. These are all variable and hence cause variable results. Extensive bombardment operations were conducted over a long period of time by the British during the late war against the Dardanelles and also against the very strongly fortified Belgium coast, with varying degrees of success, depending upon the above-mentioned conditions. Considering the experiences of the late war, together with mechanical and other improvements likely to be developed in the future, the danger to the 'lower bay site' from enemy bombardment, especially during the absence from port of our fleet, is a material disadvantage as compared with the Carquinez Strait site.

"(b) Attack by land or air forces: Such operations presuppose the enemy to be established ashore in the eastern Pacific. Unless our fleet is considerably inferior to the enemy fleet they are negligible possibilities. The contingency is so remote as hardly to warrant taking into account. If there is any advantage in these particulars it rests with the Carquinez Strait site.

"1. Seamanship aspects: The severe southerly gales which are frequent about San Francisco during the fall and winter are a positive drawback to the 'lower bay sites,' which are much exposed to wind and sea from that quarter. Docking, the operation of small craft, and other ordinary processes will necessarily be interrupted seriously during such gales.

"The Carquinez Strait site, on the other hand, is advantageously situated in this respect, being well sheltered by the close proximity of high land in the dangerous quarter. The frequency of fog in San Francisco Bay renders navigation somewhat difficult. There is less fog in the upper bay, which offers some advantage to the Carquinez site for the handling of vessels in the immediate vicinity of the station. On the other hand, this is counterbalanced by the longer average distance which ships must travel to reach Carquinez than would be necessary to reach a lower bay site. The tidal currents are inconveniently great, but virtually appear to disclose an important advantage of the lower bay sites in the greater width of the harbor in their vicinity, thus permitting large ships to be maneuvered more safely. Undoubtedly this is of some advantage. But whether or not this condition should be a decisive consideration in eliminating Carquinez Strait must depend upon the degree of inconvenience and the danger involved in maneuvering large ships in Carquinez Strait and whether such danger and inconvenience can be reduced to a reasonable minimum by ordinary means, such as wharves, tugs, buoys, etc.

"Perhaps the best way to determine this essential fact is by comparison with other places at which large vessels are maneuvered under circumstances similar to those which would obtain at Carquinez Strait, including similarity of tidal conditions. The space immediately adjacent to the Carquinez Strait site that would be available for the maneuvering of large ships incident to dock-yard purposes corresponds almost exactly in width to similar space at Rosyth, Scotland, the great British dock yard which served the larger units of the Grand Fleet during the late war. Maneuvering widths are considerably smaller still at all other big British dock yards, including those at Cromarty, Sheerness, Chatham, Portsmouth, and Devonport. The principal anchorage adjacent to the New York Navy Yard is in the Hudson River off Manhattan Island, where the deep-water maneuvering width is less than that off the proposed Carquinez Strait site. The largest vessels in the world are handled habitually in the Hudson River.

"In the great fleet anchorage off Hampton Roads the average width of the channel deep enough for battleship maneuvering (35 feet) is virtually the same as the deep-water maneuvering space off the Carquinez site. In places Hampton Roads is slightly wider and elsewhere slightly narrower. Hence it appears that the channel width off Carquinez site is ample to meet the ordinary demands of convenience and safety, considering the liberal number of berths alongside wharves provided in the Carquinez Strait project, the ease and safety with which large vessels may be handled there under adverse circumstances of tide by means of tugs, warping lines, etc., and the fact that the Carquinez site maneuvering space is capable of large expansion at small expense in the event of a considerable increase in the number of vessels to be handled (by extension of the western scour bulkhead). The moderate width of the maneuvering space is adequate and is not a serious disadvantage. The superiority of the Lower Bay sites in respect to maneuvering appears to be more than counterbalanced by their inferiority in respect to exposure to gales for which there is no reasonable remedy.

"Conclusion.—(1) From a military standpoint the only important difference between the Carquinez site and the Lower Bay locations is a considerable superiority possessed by the Carquinez site on account of its being more secure against enemy bombardment from seaward. (2) From a seamanship standpoint there is no important defect in the Carquinez site. In balancing the several advantages and disadvantages of the two general localities (Carquinez and Lower Bay) the superiority is in favor of the Carquinez Strait project.

"Captain, United States Navy."
E. L. BEACH,
Captain, United States Navy.

APPENDIX 5.

NOVEMBER 19, 1920.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY.

MY DEAR MR. CURRY: Understanding that you had in mind to call upon me for an expression of views upon the military features of a naval base at Mare Island as compared with the other sites under consideration by the congressional committee yesterday, when I was, through a misunderstanding, absent from the meeting, I am submitting the following for consideration by the committee if it is not too late and if you can place it before them. Before doing so I think I should attempt to qualify as an expert by stating the experience I have had in connection with the study of localities for naval bases. I have been a member of two classes at the Naval War College and was subsequently among those retained after my second War College course as members of the War College staff, and I served on that staff for over two years. In consequence of my War College experience and training I have been assigned to special reconnaissance duty during four subsequent cruises for the purpose of examining harbors for naval bases, both major and minor, in both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Under these assignments I have made special reconnaissance of practically every harbor on the Atlantic coast of North and South America as far south as Bahia, Brazil, and all of the islands of the Atlantic between America and Europe for the purpose of collecting data for both grand fleet bases and advance bases to be used in the event of European wars and of all harbors on the Pacific coast of America as far south as Panama and of many of the islands of the Pacific between North America and Asia to collect data in connection with home bases and advance bases in event of a war with an Asiatic power. I believe that in this work I have had as much, if not more, experience as any other officer in the Navy.

In his remarks concerning the military features of the naval base on San Francisco Bay, Captain Potts invited attention to the fact that a hostile fleet, by approaching the coast south of Golden Gate out of range of the land defenses at the Gate, could take up a position somewhere near Half Moon Bay, from which it could effectively shell a naval base at Hunters Point.

This was admitted to be a fact by Congressman BRITTEN, but the latter asked it if was not feasible to have mobile batteries of heavy guns on a railway along the coast which could be advanced as far down the coast as might be necessary to drive a hostile fleet out of range of the Hunters Point site. Of course, as a military engineering proposition, this is possible, but it admits, from a military standpoint, that the Hunters Point site is a vulnerable one and would require such protection, whereas the Mare Island site, over 30 miles retired from the coast, would not. Furthermore, it being admitted that the Hunters Point site (and what I say of Hunters Point is almost equally true of the Alameda site) will need mobile coast defense guns, the cost of such military protection and its maintenance should be included in the consideration of the cost of a base at Hunters Point. This cost, I am sure, would be far in excess of the cost of such mobile batteries as we used them in France, which was enormous in proportion to fixed defenses, for the coast line from Golden Gate to Half Moon Bay is a succession of hills, canyons, and precipitous cliffs entirely without any existing railroad which might be utilized, and differing vastly from the fields of France.

It should be borne in mind in connection with Hunters Point that it lies upon a narrow peninsula between San Francisco Bay and the ocean, and if the naval base were established there the enemy would be strongly tempted to attempt its destruction by a raid with a strong land force put ashore from the fleet somewhere down the coast of the peninsula; while Mare Island, located more than 30 miles away from the coast and on the farther side of the bay, would be almost immune from such an attack.

Remembering that in our recent war with Germany our fleet in the Atlantic did not take up its base at Hampton Roads during its period of inactivity, but retired to positions of greater security in the James and York Rivers, even though a prospect of a raid from the sea was extremely improbable, it seems a logical conclusion that in the event of a war in the Pacific the commander in chief of a fleet on the Pacific coast would not send his ships or his divisions, during a temporary period of inactivity, to anchorages in San Francisco Lower Bay, but would send them, as was done in the Atlantic, to the remotest deep-water anchorage accessible from the bay; in other words, to Carquinez Strait. That being probable, and other things being equal, it is there that they should find the facilities for docking and repair. An examination of the charts will show that the deep-water anchorage area in and around Carquinez Strait is practically as great as that in the vicinity of Hunters Point and Alameda. No area in and around San Francisco Bay would accommodate the whole grand fleet in time of war, and it would be contrary to all military ethics to assume that the whole fleet would ever have to be so accommodated during the actual operations of war.

I have seen it frequently stated that the maintenance of a deep-water channel through the Pinole Shoal—in other words, San Pablo Channel—would have to be considered in connection with the naval base on Carquinez Strait. I feel absolutely certain that commercial necessity will, in the future, keep open that deep-water channel to the industries which are developing along the trunk-line railroads which flank Carquinez Strait and that never a penny will be needed for that purpose from a naval appropriation. The deep-laden freighters which must reach those commercial industries will draw just as much water as a dreadnought.

I have also seen it stated that a disabled dreadnought drawing perhaps 7 or 8 feet more than normal condition, could not reach a dry dock in Carquinez Strait. As a matter of fact, the depth of water at mean low water through San Pablo Channel is just as great from a navigable standpoint as the depth of water in the channels over the bar outside of the Golden Gate, and the rise and fall of tide of 7 feet in San Pablo Channel would permit any disabled dreadnought which could get into the Golden Gate to reach the docks on Carquinez Strait twice a day.

There is another military feature, which has a collateral rather than a direct bearing upon the selection of the naval base, and that is its vulnerability to bombing from aircraft. So far as that is concerned every site under consideration would be equally vulnerable; and the only effective protection, wherever the base might be located, would be a greater air force than the enemy had. There would be, however, what might be termed a "psychological military disadvantage" in this connection if the base were at Hunters Point or Alameda, for the attempts at bombing would be equally destructive to the city of San Francisco itself, and as such attempts would be persistent and unceasing there would be the gradual weakening of the resisting morale of that vast community, which would have its influence toward terminating the war before the object for which we were fighting had been fully attained. If the base were at Mare Island, where the community is a small one and the esprit almost entirely of a military or a semimilitary character, this psychomilitary disadvantage would disappear.

Mahan has stated that the fundamental considerations for determining upon a naval base are its position, its strength, and its resources. In resources, Mare Island has the advantage of an already established industrial plant for the building and repair of vessels and of an already established and highly organized industrial community. In strength, which means security from attack and defensive characteristics, Mare Island has the undisputed advantage over all other sites on San Francisco Bay of remoteness from the ocean, behind the screen of the high-powered guns at the Golden Gate, and of long, circuitous, and almost impracticable routes of approach from the sea by landing forces. In position, it lies contiguous to a commodious deep-water anchorage, flanked by the main transcontinental trunk railroad lines, and accessible to the deepest draft war vessels now afloat at all stages of the tide, and also accessible to them if in a damaged condition at or near high water twice a day.

What I have stated is not influenced in the least degree by any personal sentiment or interest in Mare Island or its locality. Most of my shore duty has been on the Atlantic coast, at the Naval Academy, in the Navy Department, and at Newport, R. I. My study of San Francisco Bay began about nine years ago, when, with all the equipment of my intensive training in reconnaissance, my attention was focused on the locality through my assignment to command a capital ship on the Pacific coast. Up to about a year and one-half ago, however, I could not find any one site which satisfied all the conditions requisite for a major naval base, and my testimony before the Helm Board in Washington in 1916 will show that I have, until recently, been of an open mind and without conviction as to the best site. In my search, however, I found my professional mind turning back again and again toward Mare Island, but I was always brought to a standstill by visualizing the narrow and comparatively shallow straits lying between Mare Island and Vallejo. And this, I believe, is the vision which arises in the minds of all officers and others who have in the past given Mare Island consideration for a naval base. About a year and one-half ago, when I was captain of the yard at Mare Island, I was called upon by the public works officer to look over a plan for dry docks and piers at the south end of the island, abutting upon Carquinez Strait—in other words, the plan which is now before the congressional committee. Immediately upon seeing this I realized that my problem had been solved. I felt exactly like a mathematician who has worked persistently and unsuccessfully upon a difficult equation until nearly giving it up and then comes upon a definite, concrete, exact solution. In other words, with all the military, industrial, engineering, and economic factors on one side of the equation, I had been unable to find the value of "X." The plan then unfolded to me, and now before the congressional committee, shows conclusively and convincingly, to my mind, the value of "X" to be Mare Island.

OFFICE OF PRESIDENT, NAVAL GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL,
Navy Yard, Mare Island, Calif., November 23, 1920.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CURRY: Noting that in the final meetings of the congressional committee on the San Francisco naval base the point was raised that the Carquinez Strait site offered insufficient anchorage room and that there was not room at that site for maneuvering vessels of the fleet, I would like to amplify my previous remarks upon that subject in the fourth paragraph of my letter of November 19, 1920. As to anchorage room, I think some confusion of thought must have arisen between a naval base and a fleet rendezvous. A commander in chief, even in time of peace, endeavors to keep his fleet away from a naval base as much as possible, sending only such vessels to the base as must necessarily go for docking, repair, revictualing, or refueling, and endeavors to get them away from there again as quickly as possible. In time of war his effort in this direction would be still greater, so it is scarcely conceivable that more than 25 per cent of his fighting force would be at a base at one time. The Carquinez Strait anchorage is about 8 miles long and almost uniformly one-half mile wide, excepting abreast the proposed dock sites, where it is three-quarters of a mile. It would thus accommodate, in single column, at single anchors, with from 45 to 60 fathoms of chain, at least 24 first-line battleships or dreadnoughts, and if permanent moorings were placed, it would accommodate double this number. Fourteen more could be accommodated in the proposed slips at the docking site. Riding at a single anchor alone, therefore, there is room in Carquinez Strait for all the first-line battleships or dreadnoughts we have in the Navy or building to-day. In addition to this anchorage area, there extends from Benicia northward, along the Solano County shore, a further anchorage area, three-quarters of a mile wide and 4 miles long, which would accommodate, at a single anchor, at least 50 war vessels drawing 20 feet or less, such as destroyers, or twice that number at fixed moorings, in the most sheltered position to be found anywhere around San Francisco Bay. This, together with the berthing space in Mare Island Straits, gives the Carquinez site an anchorage berthing capacty for at least one-quarter of a war fleet of 700 vessels. Both the Carquinez Strait anchorage and the Hunters Point-Alameda anchorage are sufficient for all possible contingencies which could arise now or in the future, and, for fleet rendezvous purposes, the large anchorage areas from the commercial fairways between San Francisco and Oakland to the entrance to San Pablo Channel would be auxiliary to either the Carquinez Strait site or the Hunters Point-Alameda site, according to which is ultimately chosen for the naval base. So far, then, as anchorage room is concerned, honors are absolutely even between the three main sites under consideration in San Francisco Bay.

The point raised that there is not maneuvering room is rather hard for me to understand. No maneuvers are ever attempted or contemplated or in any way necessary at a naval base, excepting those of entering and anchoring, or of getting under way and leaving, or of entering docks or slips. At least five divisions of dreadnoughts could enter Carquinez Strait and anchor in column of less than the same number could enter the anchorage area between Hunters Point and Alamdea and anchor in double column, which would be necessary, because that area south of the commercial fairway between San Francisco and Oakland is broader and shorter than the Carquinez Strait area. Entering and leaving docks and slips would be just as easy in either locality. Getting under way and leaving during a flood tide, which would naturally be chosen, excepting in emergency, would be equally easy in both localities. If an emergency arose requiring the departure of vessels during an ebb tide, the Hunters Point anchorage would be just as much congested with its five divisions in double column as the Carquinez Strait locality with its five divisions in single column, and the time necessary to get all the ships under way and in formation, beaded out, would be practically the same. Assuming only a single column of dreadnoughts anchored off Hunters Point, it is probable that they would back and fill once in order to turn around during ebb tide, just as vessels in Carquinez Strait would have to do. Even if they did not, there could scarcely be a difference of more than 20 minutes in getting turned and pointed out. Moreover, turning in Carquinez Strait, where the deep water lies close to high land or unmistakable landmarks on either side, could be done with much less chance of getting aground than turning between Hunters Point-Alameda, where the deep water is flanked by a mile or more of shoals under water, and this would be especially true in a fog.

In paragraph 2 of my letter of November 19, concerning mobile batteries for driving a hostile fleet away from the vicinity of Half Moon Bay, I failed to mention that the railway for transporting such batteries could not run along the seashore, because it would be exposed to destruction by enemy gunfire, but would have to take the more difficult engineering routes through the hills, back of the seashore, and also that such batteries would be impotent in a fog where the hostile fleet could approach the coast on soundings, unseen, and take up their bombardment.

In rebuttal of Captain Potts's statement that Hunters Point was within reach of the 14-inch guns of an enemy fleet, a member of the committee remarked, "So was Helgoland." This would be an incorrect comparison, for Helgoland was not a naval base but an outlying fortress screening a naval rendezvous and naval bases in its rear, precisely as the forts at our Golden Gate would screen a naval base in Carquinez Strait.

Yours very truly,

J. M. ELLICOTT.

APPENDIX 6.

BENICIA ARSENAL,
Benicia, Calif., November 21, 1920.

Hon. CHARLES F. CURRY,
Member of Congress, Third California District,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: 1. In reply to the questions asked in your telegram dated November 20, 1920, there are specified below my qualifications as an expert and my professional opinion regarding the comparative merits, as viewed from a military standpoint, of the three naval base sites under consideration in the San Francisco Bay.

2. The following experience indicates my qualifications as an expert:

(a) Graduate United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., class of 1894.

(b) Six years' service in the Artillery Corps, three of these in the Coast Artillery and three in the Field Artillery. During a part of my service in the Artillery I was stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco.

(c) Approximately 21 years' service as an officer in the Ordnance Department of the United States Army. During approximately seven years of my service in the Ordnance Department I was on duty in the War Department, holding important assignments having to do with the designing and manufacture of coast defense and field artillery guns and ammunition.

(d) I had active service in the World War on the staff of General Pershing as chief ordnance officer, First Army, American Expeditionary Forces, throughout practically all of the activities of the American forces in France.

(e) From my former service at the Presidio of San Francisco and my service for the past 20 months as commanding officer of the Benicia Arsenal, located on the Carquinez Strait, approximately 10 miles from the Mare Island Navy Yard, I am thoroughly familiar with the geography of San Francisco Bay, the location and character of the fortifications at the entrance to San Francisco Harbor, together with the character of the coast line and waters adjacent thereto.

3. The three proposed naval base sites to be given consideration are Hunters Point, Alameda, and Carquinez Strait (Mare Island), respectively. As regards the possibility of bombardment, an examination of the Coast and Geodetic Survey chart No. 5530 covering San Francisco Bay shows that the proposed sites at Hunters Point and at Alameda are well within the range of the large caliber guns of modern battleships lying offshore over approximately a 25-mile stretch from Half Moon Bay on the south to Bolinas Bay on the north of the entrance to San Francisco Harbor. In view of the local fog conditions which sometimes cause the forts at the entrance to San Francisco Harbor to be enveloped in fog while the coast to the north or south is comparatively clear, it seems possible for an enemy fleet to bombard the vicinity of San Francisco without the coast-defense guns being fully effective in reply. Such an attack would, of course, be practicable only in the case of a naval raid or in case the enemy should have a temporary supremacy at that place.

4. I consider the probability of such a bombardment as not great, but the location of a navy yard close to the large cities of San Francisco and Oakland, would, in my opinion, be objectionable in that it would increase the incentive to an attack as well as the area of the target for long-range fire. An examination of the chart previously referred to shows that the Carquinez Strait site—Mare Island—is so far inland as to be beyond the range of the most powerful ships' guns from any point on the coast. Before its being brought within range it would be necessary for warships to pass from the lower bay up the channel beyond Angel Island.

5. As regards the defense by land fortifications, these would give a reasonably satisfactory defense, but not a complete one. The primary purpose of the land fortifications is to prevent an enemy fleet from entering San Francisco Harbor. A secondary but important purpose is to prevent the bombardment of the city of San Francisco. But this can not be guaranteed under adverse weather conditions, especially in view of the very long range guns that are being mounted on the latest battleships.

6. As regards the use of railroad guns and their effectiveness against capital ships, it may be stated that the primary purpose of railroad guns is to prevent the landing of troops and their advance inland. As compared with guns in permanent fortifications, this type of artillery is especially vulnerable to fire from high-power guns on warships and could not, in our opinion, be expected to successfully cope with such fire. It is a generally accepted principle of attack by fleets on shore defenses that the fleet will bring to bear a great superiority of gun power. Some ships would thus be allotted to keep down the fire of railroad artillery while others would be allotted for bombardment purposes. (There are no railroads running along the coast on the ocean shores north or south of the Golden Gate. The construction of such railroads would be for defense purposes only and would be ineffective, difficult of construction, and expensive. The cost of such roads and their military equipment with railroad guns, etc., should be added to the estimated cost of the constructon of a naval base on the lower bay.—C. F. CURRY, M. C., third California district.)

7. The effect of the presence of a naval base as an attraction inviting bombardment of the bay cities has already been referred to. The presence of an important navy yard would, in my opinion, invite bombardment both from warships and from airplanes with consequent increased danger to the adjacent cities.

8. From a military viewpoint one of the most serious dangers to which a navy yard at Hunters Point would be subjected is possible capture by a landing force which had been put ashore on the coast south of San Francisco and had marched overland. The Alameda site is subject to a similar danger, but to a somewhat less extent. The purposed Carquinez Strait site—Mare Island—is located far enough inland to be given materially better protection aganst a land attack. The Army General Staff some years ago laid down the principle that for defensive reasons no future arsenal for the manufacture or storage of Army ordnance supplies should be located on or near a coast line. A similar principle would seem applicable to naval activities in so far as is consistent with limitations governing the character of channels of approach or other purely naval considerations.

E. P. O'HERN,
Colonel, Ordnance Department, United States Army.

APPENDIX 7.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, we have with us Mr. Howard C. Holmes, who is one of the best civil engineers we have in private practice here in the State. As I stated before, he was the engineer for the State harbor commission for a number of years and built the Hunters Point dry dock. Mr. Holmes has no financial interest in Vallejo. He has not been employed by any interest in Vallejo. He is not receiving any compensation either from the citizens of Vallejo or from the city of Vallejo or from its chamber of commerce. He has kindly consented to come here to tell you what he thinks, from his years of experience as an engineer on and around San Francisco Bay and its contiguous waters, as to where the proper location for a naval base should be.

Mr. HOWARD C. HOLMES. Mr. President, Mr. CURRY puts it a little strong when he says I come to give my opinion as to what I think. I am merely here to state facts as to conditions both at Hunters Point, Mare Island, and Alameda. My experience in Alameda first was in 1884. At that time I built the trestle and mole for what was then known as the South Pacific Coast Railroad. In fact, even earlier than that, some time in 1880, I designed the original ferry slip for that company. Since that time I have built the Western Pacific mole on the other side. My experience at Hunters Point has been in the designing and constructing of both the present dry docks at that point, and in 1913, I think, I made some soundings and some observations and a report on the south end of Mare Island for additional dry docks. As I said before, I won't attempt to comment on that. Since that time I have been employed by the contractors as engineer for making the borings and soundings both at Hunters Point and at Alameda, and I will state to you merely what I have found.

First, in regard to Alameda, I am satisfied that the only dock that could be practically built at the Helm board site at Alameda would be a gravity dock resting on a pile foundation. At the time of the hearing in September, 1919, at Mare Island, the writer testified before the Admiral McKean board, at which Secretary of Navy Daniels was present, to this same effect. Since that time I have had charge of the soundings taken there and am satisfied, as I stated above, that the only type of dock would be a gravity dock, constructed in a similar manner to that of the Pearl Harbor. This would involve the driving of some 10,500 piles, the excavation of between 750,000 and 1,000,000 cubic yards of material, the placing of about 160,000 cubic yards of mass concrete. While the dredging may seem excessive, I am satisfied that it would require fully this amount, for the reason that the strata of the subsoils is such that it would not stand at a slope of less than one in five to one in six.

Without going more into details, based on the present conditions of the material and labor markets, I am satisfied this dock could not be constructed for less than between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000.

Now, as to Hunters Point: From my investigations of the locality proposed for the three dry docks by the Helm Naval Board, I am satisfied that a dock in this locality would have to be of a combination type; that is, a portion would be a gravity dock, resting on a pile foundation; the middle section of the dock would consist of a gravity dock, resting on a rock bottom, and the balance might be of what is known as a veneer dock, similar to docks 2 and 3 of the Union Iron Works at Hunters Point proper.

The placing of these docks at the Helm's site would involve the moving of between one and a half and two million cubic yards of material, varying from green serpentine to quartzite. If there were no fault lines struck in the land portion of the dock, this dock would probably cost in the neighborhood of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. Of course, you understand that the cream of locations at this site are the present docks of the Union Iron Works, and any dock that might be built in the near future would cost from 100 to 200 per cent more than the above said docks.

The construction of a dock as above described—that is, a dock, resting partly on piles and partly on a solid rock foundation—is at the best poor practice, but I doubt if it would stand in the Bay of San Francisco, for the reason of the danger of earthquake disturbances. I am satisfied that an earthquake, even of the milder type, would rupture any dock of this character, for the reason that the material in which the piles are driven is more susceptible to earthquake waves than would be the land portion, theoretically to the extent of seven to one.

The location of the docks at Mare Island, as suggested by Commander Cox, would, if they could be built in the dry and veneered so that the 2-foot thickness of concrete, involving the use of some 30,000 cubic yards, would be sufficient, should not cost to exceed $2,500,000. This is exclusive of the excavation necessary to prepare the site for the docks, which would involve the removal of some 3,000,000 cubic yards of material.

In the Alameda site it would be necessary, in order to reclaim the land for the proposed site, to construct retaining walls around the entire area. No portion of such retaining walls could be built of any material on the ground. It would necessitate the bringing of rock to the site that was not subject to disintegration by the action of the salt water, or, say, in the matter of dollars and cents, a retaining wall for Alameda of such rock would not cost less than $30 per linear foot.

What retaining walls that would be needed at either Mare Island or Hunters Point could be constructed, as far as the core is concerned, with the material excavated from the site—that is, in the first case, sandstone, and in the second case, green serpentine. The cost of such walls would be probably nil, as the material excavated could be taken directly to the site. The question of dredging both at Hunters Point and Alameda is a much larger proposition than that at Mare Island. The question of walls and docks, etc., at Alameda would probably be at least from 50 to 75 per cent more expensive than those at either Mare Island or Hunters Point. In the latter cases, they would be about the same. Of course, any walls or piers constructed at any naval base would have to be of extra heavy type ranging in cost from $5 to $9 per square foot.

At the various sites the structures for appurtenances would have to have a pile foundation. Those, of course, at Alameda would be more expensive than either those at Hunters Point or Mare Island. The cost of caissons, pump houses, and other machinery would cost the same at all three localities. Undoubtedly the transportation of materials would cost less at Hunters Point and Mare Island than they would at Alameda, and I am satisfied, without going into details, the cost of upkeep in the matter of dredging would be greater at both Alameda and Hunters Point than it would be at Mare Island. Without comment on any reason for this, I think that a glance at the maps would be sufficient argument to substantiate this statement.

I will say, furthermore, in regard to Alameda, the reason why they would have to have this Pearl Harbor type of dock is that the bottom of any gravity dock at this location would be below the line of seepage; that is, there is water strata all through this location, and the strata run from 40 feet below to 120 feet below the surface, being water-bearing sand and some of it almost quicksand.

Of course, at Hunters Point, you can realize that there could not be any dock built there in any locality that would cost as little as either Dock No. 2 or Dock No. 3. They were veneered from top to bottom. But I am satisfied to-day that they could not be duplicated for double the cost, and that any dock now built at any site at Hunters Point would cost now fully double what a dock could be built for then, even at the site at which those are built that are now there.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I ask Mr. Holmes a question there?

Senator BALL. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Holmes, did I understand you to say that there would be more dredging at Hunters Point and at Alameda than there would be up here at Mare Island?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. Just where did you get your calculations for it?

Mr. HOLMES. I get my calculations from the contour lines.

Mr. BRITTEN. The contour lines?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. And where do you figure the base is to be laid up here—did you figure on Carquinez Strait?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. On whose plans?

Mr. HOLMES. I made the original survey there myself in 1913, but I figure on Commander Cox's plans.

Mr. BRITTEN. Which one is that?

Mr. HOLMES. This one here [indicating].

Mr. BRITTEN. The one on the right hand?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. You are not talking about the relief map now?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; talking about the relief map.

Mr. BRITTEN. That does not show Carquinez Strait, does it?

Mr. HOLMES. Oh, yes; that is Carquinez Strait.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, I see what you mean. Were those plans gotten up by the Bureau of Yards and Docks?

Mr. HOLMES. I think not.

Mr. BRITTEN. They were not?

Mr. HOLMES. I think not.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wonder if they were submitted to the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. HOLMES. I don't know.

Mr. BRITTEN. Commander Cox, can you answer that?

Commander COX. They were included in a report that was submitted to the Secretary of the Navy. I have no knowledge of what became of them afterwards.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am just trying to find out and determine on what Mr. Holmes bases his estimate of the amount of dredging necessary to be done as between Hunters Point and Carquinez Straits.

Mr. HOLMES. I base it on the strength of that model, and I know what Hunters Point is from having worked there and from the Helm plan.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it possible to build another veneered dock at Hunters Point?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. You said something about earthquakes?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. Have recent earthquakes affected the present docks at Hunters Point?

Mr. HOLMES. No, sir. But that all rests in the solid rock.

Mr. BRITTEN. Something was said yesterday along that line, Mr. Holmes, to this effect: That a dock built directly on stone, with veneer, such as you have there, would be more susceptible to earthquake than one built on piles. What is your impression of that?

Mr. HOLMES. My answer to that would be just the same comparison as was made of the man in jail when his attorney told him they could not put him in jail. The dock is still there, and it has been through several earthquakes, and even the chimney was not disturbed. The only effect of the earthquake of 1906 was that on the upper end of that dock—that is, on what you would call the westerly end—was about a 40-foot fill, and that fill settled. In other words, the earthquake shook the earth down the same as you would shake potatoes down in a barrel or a basket, otherwise it didn't affect it. The chimney is slightly cracked, but it is there now.

Mr. BRITTEN. Are you quite satisfied of the fact that if a combination dock were built at Hunters Point, part on gravity, part on piles, and part as a veneer, that an earthquake would affect that kind of a dock

Mr. HOLMES. I would not like to build it; I would not like to guarantee it. I think that is poor construction, aside from the matter of earthquake. It is not considered good construction, part of it founded on piles and part of it in rock foundation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then, from what you have said, it is practically impossible, or really impracticable, to build another dock at Hunters Point?

Mr. HOLMES. No; because another character of dock could be built on either side of the present docks, both north and south.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is, a thousand-foot dock?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. So that Hunters Point is practically eliminated from this consideration.

Mr. HOLMES. If available land—if you could have the land owned at the present time by the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the land to the north, you could probably build two additional docks there, that would be—well, while they would not be fully veneered docks, they would be docks resting on solid rock foundation.

Mr. BRITTEN. The land to the north belongs to the State and to the county, does it not?

Mr. HOLMES. No; it belongs mostly to the same company that owned the old California dry dock. There is a little piece in there called "Dry Dock Basin" that belongs to the State of California. But it is very small.

Mr. HICKS. Is it not a fact, Mr. Holmes, that noted scientists and geologists all agree, and, in fact, it is printed in one of these hearings that we have, that a rock formation is less susceptible to earthquakes than any other formation?

Mr. HOLMES. I think I would rather have my house founded on a rock foundation than otherwise during an earthquake.

Mr. HICKS. I think that is covered very fully here.

Mr. PADGETT. You spoke about the dock at Hunters Point, Mr. Holmes, and you said part of it would be a gravity dock. You mean by "gravity dock" a dock similar to the Pearl Harbor Dock?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. In other words, that it would be a floating dock, a little heavier than the water.

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. Then the other part of the dock would be a permanent dock on the land?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir. If you will allow me——

Mr. PADGETT (interrupting). Here is one part of it, and here is the other [illustrating by drawing], and you have got the gravity part as the Pearl Harbor Dock that is resting on the water, and the other one is permanent construction in the land?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. I don't think that needs any argument as to not being advisable.

Mr. HOLMES. I don't think so, either.

Mr. BRITTEN. Just at that point, and for the record—I recognize this gentleman's ability: Supposing a dock were constructed along the lines suggested by you, could not that be sufficiently tied by reinforced concrete so as to make it more or less impervious to an earthquake?

Mr. HOLMES. I think in the case of an earthquake the reinforcement would not do much good.

Mr. BRITTEN. You don't think it would?

Mr. HOLMES. No, sir. I know that at the time of the earthquake I was engineer of the harbor commission, or rather had just left there, and you could notice there was a decided difference. For instance, the Ferry Building itself rests on piles. The first fill back of that rests upon a pile platform, and back of that is a fill on the mud, and that fill is 40 to 50 years old. But you could see the distinct line of demarcation between those different fills. In other words, of course, the building moved not at all. The portion of filling on piles settled somewhat. The fill resting on mud settled anywhere from 3 to 5 feet below the level of the docks, showing distinctly the different effects. You understand that properly, Mr. BRITTEN, that in the mud in front of the Ferry Building—there has never been any bottom struck. Wells have put down as deep as 200 feet and exactly the same character of mud was found, except it was a little denser, and a foundation resting on piles depends solely on the skin friction of the piles in the mud.

Mr. PADGETT. From the borings that you made over at Alameda did you get to a permanent, solid bottom for the piles to rest on, or would some of the piles have to depend on skin friction?

Mr. HOLMES. You might get something to hold your piling, but the question is, what is below that? We bored to about 150 feet.

Mr. PADGETT. You went to 150 feet?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. Were you still in water at 150 feet?
Mr. HOLMES. No; we struck what we called a clay formation.
Mr. PADGETT. But you did not go below that?
Mr. HOLMES. No, we did not go below that.
Mr. PADGETT. You would have to have piles, though, going from the surface to that depth of 140 to 150 feet?
Mr. HOLMES. Yes; and below that.
Mr. PADGETT. And go partly into that clay?
Mr. HOLMES. Well, to be plain, Mr. PADGETT, at the Alameda mole, and all through that country, you depend upon what you call skin friction piling. In some cases in the western Pacific mole there is some hardpan, but the most of it depends on friction of the mud around the piles.
Mr. PADGETT. Would it be advisable to rest a dock as heavy as this dock would be, and with the load in it, upon piles depending upon skin friction alone?
Mr. HOLMES. That is what you have at Pearl Harbor now.
Mr. PADGETT. But that is slightly heavier than the water itself.
Mr. HOLMES. Yes; that is what this dock would be—the same type of dock.
Mr. PADGETT. At Alameda?
Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; constructed in the same manner.
Mr. PADGETT. Just slightly heavier than the water?
Mr. HOLMES. Yes. It is of the same type. There is another matter I would like to bring to the attention of you gentlemen, and that is the comparison that was made at the San Francisco hearing—it may not be the proper place here; it may be that it should be made on Friday—the comparison of the cost of the Dock No. 2 at Mare Island and the Dock No. 2 at Hunters Point.
Mr. PADGETT. The one at Pearl Harbor was largely experimental.
Mr. HOLMES. I am speaking now about the comparison in cost of the dock at Mare Island and Dock No. 2 at Hunters Point. They are identical as to size.
Mr. PADGETT. Oh, I thought you said Pearl Harbor.
Mr. HOLMES. At the Mare Island Yard they had a similar experience with Dock No. 2 that they did at Pearl Harbor. The dock was started by the cofferdam method and was a failure. They spent something in the neighborhood of, I think, a half million dollars. Then there was a successful design made for a self-contained cofferdam, which is what they originally started at Pearl Harbor, where it was not successful. On the other hand, the dock at Hunters Point, Dock No. 2, is virtually entirely veneered, and there was no experiment there. I was there from the time it was first started to the date of its completion. There was but something like one-half of 1 per cent extras. In other words, there was no change in plans. So I claim that the comparison as to costs made between the Mare Island dock and the Hunters Point dock is not right. That is, in reality the Mare Island dock would not cost as much in excess of the Hunters Point dock. It would cost probably three times as much, but not four or five times as much as stated at the San Francisco hearing.

APPENDIX 8.

WAR DEPARTMENT, AIR SERVICE,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, December 7, 1920.

DEAR MR. CURRY: I am answering your question of yesterday regarding the location of Mare Island Navy Yard from the standpoint of aerial offense and defense.

The fact that the Mare Island base is 26 miles from the coast line gives it a slight advantage over a station situated nearer the coast. The important factor is having aerial defense stations located close enough to provide the proper defense. The naval base at Mare Island is not located near any large center of population and, therefore, is not dependent on any big city for lines of communication or supplies. This in itself is a good point, inasmuch as a successful bombardment of a big city could easily disrupt all lines of communication in the immediate vicinity.

A rather general survey of the question would lead me to believe that the Mare Island naval base is strategically located from the aviation standpoint in the scheme of national defense.

Sincerely,
WM. MITCHELL,
Brigadier General, United States Army.
By MAXWELL KIRBY,
Major, Air Service, Assistant.

HON. CHARLES F. CURRY,
Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 49, line 4, after the word "walls," to insert "and maintenance dredging," and strike out "(limit of cost $2,800,000), $750,000, to be available immediately," and to insert "$250,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Navy yard, Mare Island, Calif.: Rebuilding dikes, wharves, and quay walls, and maintenance dredging, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 8, after the numerals "$40,000," to insert "Pier No. 4, extension, $500,000"; and at the end of line 9, to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$590,000," so as to read:

Navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash.: Central power-plant improvements, $40,000; Pier No. 4, extension, $500,000; dredging, $50,000; in all, $590,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 13, after the numerals "$38,000," to insert "addition to machine shop, $100,000"; and in line 14, to strike out "$128,000" and insert "$228,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: Extension of existing paint and oil storehouse, $65,000; blocking for dry dock No. 1, $25,000; paving, grading, and railroad extension, $38,000; addition to machine shop, $100,000; in all, $228,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 4, after the numerals "$15,000," to insert a semicolon and the words "additional storage facilities, $80,000; in all, $95,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Naval ammunition depot, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: Lighting and power extension, $15,000; additional storage facilities, $80,000; in all, $95,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether there was not some little controversy over the question of the water supply at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was not any controversy, in the proper sense of that term, over it. There was a very urgent request from the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks that an appropriation be made for the extension of the water supply system at Pearl Harbor. The committee was not sufficiently impressed with the immediate necessity of it. It probably ought to be taken care of next year. We thought that the items which we did put in for Pearl Harbor were of more immediate and pressing importance; for instance, this item to take care of mines, for which now there is no storage, valuable mines of the utmost importance from a military point of view, which ought to be sheltered, being stored in the open weather.

Mr. KING. I have been informed that there was not sufficient water, and that they had very great difficulty there in obtaining suitable water not only for drinking but for culinary purposes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is the impression of the committee that they can get along for another year under the present conditions, but that next year there ought to be an appropriation for the extension of the water supply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 16, after the numerals "$64,000," to insert a semicolon and the words "grading and railroad extension, $7,500; in all, $71,500," so as to make the paragraph read:

Submarine base, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: Extension of existing building for battery storage and overhaul, $64,000; grading and railroad extension, $7,500; in all, $71,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Bureau of Aeronautics," on page 51, line 7, to insert "for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, $6,537,000; for new construction, buildings and improvements at air stations, $300,000," and a semicolon, so as to read:

AVIATION, NAVY.

For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, as follows: For aircraft and accessories in course of construction or manufacture on June 30, 1922, $400,000; for navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1922, $165,000; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, helium plant, air stations, fleet activities, testing laboratories, and for overhauling of planes, $5,475,000, including $475,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, $1,116,950; for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service, $710,000; for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, $6,537,000; for new construction, buildings and improvements at air stations, $300,000.

Mr. KING. I would like to have some explanation from the Senator as to what has been accomplished by the appropriation in the former bill, what buildings were constructed, what naval aircraft we have, and what the program is with respect to this appropriation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This appropriation is entirely a new item. There was nothing whatever carried in the bill as it came from the House for new aircraft or for the care of aircraft. In the report of the House committee, on page 11, the Senator will notice this statement:

The amount proposed under this head is $7,986,560. This sum exceeds the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year for the same purposes by $953,519. Under the rules of the House this committee has no jurisdiction over new construction of aircraft or new construction at aircraft stations, and for that reason it has not been possible to carry any money in this bill for such purposes. It is estimated that approximately $7,306,575 will be needed for new aircraft.

The committee of the Senate has reduced the amount stated by the House committee to be needed, and provided for the sum of $6,537,000 upon the testimony submitted to the committee by the experts of the Bureau of Aviation, including Admiral Moffett, the chief. I continue reading from the House report:

And $500,000 for construction work at aircraft stations. If the Congress should appropriate these additional sums the total for aviation for the coming year would amount to $15,793,135.

From that the Senate will see that there was no effort made by the House to provide for new aircraft construction. The life of an airplane is very short. The development and improvements of the science and the art of aviation are very rapid, and if the United States is to maintain its place as one of the nations equipped for air service and for air warfare, it is absolutely necessary that we should provide some money for building new planes or including the improvements in the science and in the art of aviation.

Also we have put in the bill, instead of the $500,000 stated by the House committee as being needed for work at aircraft stations, the reduced sum of $300,000, believing that that reduction of the amount would lead to economy on the part of the bureau.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator that ample provision ought to be made for airplanes. The Senator knows that in former discussions of the naval appropriation bills I have insisted upon large appropriations for submarines and aircraft carriers and airplanes. But the point I had in mind particularly was that we have made rather liberal appropriations in the past, not only during the war but since, as I supposed for the construction of buildings and needed establishments where aircraft might be constructed. I was rather interested to know whether the appropriations which have been made had not furnished us sufficient buildings that were suitable and necessary without further buildings? My recollection is that during the war we spent many hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars for aircraft buildings.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Unfortunately we are entirely deficient in hangars even for the airplanes we have now. At Bolling Field in Washington City, which is a very good illustration, if the Senator should go there he would find very valuable airplanes with no shelter at all, but kept in the open air, which, of course, is not economical. With the construction of new planes, of course there will be greater need for hangars. The actual situation demonstrates the propriety of this comparatively small appropriation of $300,000.

The Senator asked a moment ago as to the number of planes on hand. On January 1 we had a total number of planes—that is, those which had not been actually scrapped, including airships lighter than air, of 1,516. Of those, 614 are serviceable, as shown in the detailed table. Most of those, however, are entirely inadequate as compared with more modern planes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 51, line 9, in the total to strike out "$7,866,950" and insert in lieu thereof "$14,703,950."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, at the end of line 14, to strike out "$65,000" and insert "$74,500," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the services of draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary, to be employed only in the Bureau of Aeronautics to carry into effect the appropriation "Aviation, Navy," $74,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Naval Academy," on page 52, line 18, to reduce the appropriation for pay of professors and others from "$421,500" to "$321,500."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I would like the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill. I understand that out of this appropriation the civilian professors are paid.

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator yield to me that I may make a suggestion to the acting chairman of the committee?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. Would it be agreeable to the acting chairman of the committee to pass this amendment over until we have discussed the committee amendment on page 53, as I wish to offer an amendment to that which might make it desirable to change the amount provided in this amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. My understanding is that the two amendments relate to the same subject. If the present amendment of the committee is accepted, it means, if I understand it rightly, that the appropriation will be so reduced as that its effect would be to cut off the salaries of some 36 civilian instructors. Am I right in that?

Mr. FRANCE. That is my understanding of it, and therefore I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it would be better to discuss the amendment at the top of page 53 before we discuss this amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I asked the question I did expecting to follow it with another question applying to the amendment contained in lines 1 and 2 on page 53.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was being addressed by other Senators at the time. Did the Senator from Ohio ask me a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I did; and then the Senator from Maryland suggested that this amendment go over until after the amendment at the top of page 53 has been acted upon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is practically the same amendment. They may as well be discussed together.

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I wanted to know. They relate to the same subject. Does the Senator from Maryland desire to discuss the matter? I yield to him if he desires to do so.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the committee amendment. If that amendment should be adopted, there would be a question as to what amount should be substituted in place of the amount stricken out by the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest that the amendment to the amendment be offered now, so that we can discuss them both at the same time.

Mr. FRANCE. I shall be very glad to offer the amendment and have the Senator from Ohio discuss it. I presume he is interested in the matter dealt with in this amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not exchanged views with the Senator from Maryland on the subject.

Mr. FRANCE. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, to the committee amendment at the top of page 53.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee amendment is, on page 53, line 1, after the numerals "1922," to insert "whenever the number of civilian professors or instructors employed in such duties shall be less than 80," so as to make the paragraph read:

No part of any sum in this act appropriated shall be expended in the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Navy detailed for duty as professor or instructor at the United States Naval Academy to perform the duties which were performed by civilian professors or instructors on January 1, 1922, whenever the number of civilian professors or instructors employed in such duties shall be less than 80.

After the word "eighty" the Senator from Maryland proposes the following proviso:

Provided, That in reducing the number of civilian professors all of the provisions of the contracts between the Government and the professors shall be generously fulfilled by the Government: Provided further, That no civilian professor who has been employed for three years or more shall be dismissed without a six months' notice to him that his services will no longer be needed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as the Senate will recall, in the past I have had occasion to refer to conditions in the Naval Academy. I have had conferences with civilian instructors and others. I have had conferences with the superintendent. I had a letter from him which I introduced in the RECORD the other day, and which was self-explanatory. I have had, not recently but last year, a number of conferences with midshipmen. I have talked with members of the Board of Visitors, one the president of a great college and one of the leading educators of the country. I feel that I know somewhat of the conditions which prevail at Annapolis. I have heretofore made the statement that the institution in its teaching staff is seriously handicapped because officers were sent there who were not qualified to be teachers, and after the various conferences which I have had I am confirmed in that opinion.

The Naval Academy and the Academy at West Point ought to have the best corps of instructors and professors to be found anywhere in the United States. There are, in round numbers, 2,500 midshipmen at Annapolis. There are 115 civilian instructors and professors. There are between 140 and 150 officers. Many of these officers have never had any experience whatsoever as teachers; they have been in command of seamen at sea or elsewhere. It has been suggested that their experience in the command of sailors is somewhat akin to the experience of a teacher in a classroom, but when that statement is made I think it carries its own refutation.

In speeches which I have heretofore made bearing upon this subject I have called attention to the fact that in many of the classes in charge of officers of the Navy a midshipman would be assigned a lesson, let us say in physics, and perhaps on the following day he was expected to write on the blackboard the substance of that lesson. When a midshipman was thoughtless enough to ask the officer in charge for an explanation of some part of the text that he did not understand, on different occasions he was met with the query, "Have you not read your lesson? It is in the textbook."

If that is the kind of instruction that Uncle Sam is giving at Annapolis we ought to put a stop to it. I do not want to be understood as saying that this is a universal condition at the Naval Academy; I do not mean to say that there are not many officers of the Navy there who are efficient and proficient instructors; but a good many of them are selected from officers who have come from sea duty and are given shore assignments, some of them having had no experience whatever in teaching. I want to emphasize that.

Teaching is a profession. In the State of Ohio as well, I assume, as in nearly all of the other States of the Union, we have normal schools. Our teachers of the district schools are required to have a certain amount of training in the normal schools before they can get positions in most of our graded schools. Why? Because teaching is an art; it requires special training and special knowledge in order to guide and instruct the untrained mind; but it seems that such training and special knowledge are not regarded as necessary when it comes to the Naval Academy.

It is true the superintendent makes his selections from the men who are assigned to shore duty; and admitting, for the sake of the argument, that he gets the best available timber, it does not meet what ought to be the requirements of that great institution. I know that the most skilled educators in the country whose attention has been called to the situation are firm in the opinion that the kind of instruction which is given at Annapolis and West Point does not measure up to the character of instruction which is given in the great universities of the country. Some years ago there was a Superintendent of the Naval Academy who had determined to get rid practically of all of the civilian instructors at that institution, but Congress at that time, in order to prevent his carrying out his declared purpose, incorporated in the naval appropriation bill, as I am advised, the language which is found on page 52 of the pending bill, and is as follows:

No part of any sum in this act appropriated shall be expended in the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Navy detailed for duty as professor or instructor at the United States Naval Academy to perform the duties which were performed by civilian professors or instructors on January 1, 1922.

That language was carried in each of several appropriation bills, as I am advised, until we entered the World War. Then it was omitted because there was at that time such a demand for officers for sea duty that there was not any occasion to require the insertion of such a proviso. Last year a large number of midshipmen were "failed," and I am convinced that those failures, for the most part, were due to the fact that they did not have the proper kind of instruction. Later on, in violation, as I think, of the statute as it then was, their resignations at the end of the academic year were demanded, and they had to resign before they could get an opportunity even to confer with the Representatives or Senators from their respective States. Subsequently practically all of those young men were readmitted to the academy, of course dropping into the next lower class. Just the other day I was told by the superintendent of the academy that, with perhaps one or two exceptions, all of those young men were doing splendidly. Think what would have happened to them if they had not been readmitted to the academy!

As to the present condition various excuses are being given for reducing the number of civilian instructors. I have here a clipping from the Washington Star under an Annapolis, Md., date line of June 15, which reads:

Though stated not to be a part of the program of Rear Admiral Henry B. Wilson to cut down the number of civilian instructors at the Naval Academy and supplant them with officers of the regular line, it has become known that six assistant professors assigned to four separate academic departments have been formally notified that their services will not be needed during the next academic term. Those who have been thus informed are: William N. Wherrett, department of marine engineering; William L. Fichter and Calvert J. Winter, modern languages; Richard P. Johnson, George F. Aldrich, and Eugene S. Mayer, department of mathematics.

The situation is further explained by the fact that the number of midshipmen will be fewer next term and consequently there must be a reduction in the number of tutors in the section rooms.

But under the date of June 10, under an Annapolis date line, appears—and this extract is taken from the Baltimore American—the following:

Naval Academy authorities estimated that the class now forming will contain about 700 members, and that the whole student body at the beginning of the new academic year—October 1—will be 2,359. The student body at its maximum last year, which was the largest in the history of the institution, was 2,505.

These official figures indicate that the student body will fall little below the maximum next year and still less below the number which had been estimated to be the normal under the legislation existing until recently. This figure had been placed at 2,400.

It is quite apparent that there is no very substantial reduction in the number of students. I am told that one of the admirals the other day made a statement to the effect that the Navy was 1,000 officers short. If that is so, then there is not any special likelihood of the number of midshipmen being reduced. More than that, if the Navy is 1,000 officers short, then some of the officers acting as instructors but receiving officers' pay may be used in the ships.

When we are talking about economy, I desire to say that I have been advised by a Representative, who has been investigating this matter pretty thoroughly, that the pay of the civilian instructors runs, perhaps, only from about 60 to 70 per cent of the pay of the officers.

Mr. GLASS. The naval officers receive from 20 to 40 per cent higher salaries than do the civilian instructors.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to the Senator from Virginia, because I find he has substantially the same information that I have in that behalf. Certainly it is going to require a given number of instructors, whether they are civilians or officers, and if the civilian instructors are getting from 20 to 40 per cent less than the officers who act as instructors, it seems to me the statement is not quite fair that it is in the interest of economy to have officers there as instructors instead of civilians.

Mr. President, some of these civilian instructors have contracts running three and five years, and I think this is the matter to which the Senator from Maryland referred a moment ago. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland whether he can advise me how many of these civilian instructors have the three or five year contracts?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Sixty-seven.

Mr. FRANCE. I was under that impression.

Mr. POMERENE. There is, as I am told, some provision in some of these contracts which enables the authorities to dispense with their services if they do not measure up to the requirements morally or intellectually or from a standpoint of efficiency.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think those contracts require a certain notice.

Mr. POMERENE. I think some of them do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, evidently all of them do not, because my information is that these six civilian instructors who have practically been dismissed from the academy are contract instructors, and that they are dismissed without further notice.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; the Senator from Virginia is entirely right about that, or, at least, his information is just exactly what mine is.

Mr. LODGE. My information has been that some of the contracts were five-year contracts and some were only contracts for a year; but I think there was some provision in the five-year contracts for notice of dismissal or suspension, and in the others, too.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure the Senator from Massachusetts is right as to a part of those contracts. At least, while I have not seen them, that is the information I have.

Mr. LODGE. I know that there are some five-year contracts.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. When the question of the dismissal of some of these civilian instructors came up, it was pointed out, as I am told, to the superintendent that it would be doing a serious injustice to these men to dismiss them from the academy without notice. I am told of one man who is among the five or six who have been dismissed who has a wife and child, and who went to the expense out of his salary of building himself a home, owes a substantial sum upon it, and he is dismissed; and here is a remarkable thing about it: Under the bill as it passed the House the superintendent would have no right to dismiss any of these instructors as he now intends to do. Under the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs he has the right to dismiss 36 of them; and, wonderful to relate, he acts as if that were statutory authority now, and he does it before the Senate passes upon it. He does it evidently in the belief that the ipse dixit of the Naval Affairs Committee is to control the situation here.

Mr. President, my belief is that if we are to compare the civilian instructors with the officer instructors in Annapolis from a standpoint of efficiency as teachers, it will be found that the civilians are better than the officers. As I am advised, there are a good many of these men who have devoted their lives up to this hour to perfecting themselves in the art of imparting knowledge to the young men who are under their charge.

Mr. President, thanks to a father and mother of blessed memory, I had the opportunity of getting a college education. I have had good instructors, bad instructors, and indifferent instructors. I know the difference between them; and I want to see the best instructors that we can get for a reasonable amount of money at this academy, as well as at West Point.

Mr. President, I might go on and discuss this matter further, but I think I have said enough to demonstrate what is in my mind; and I am convinced from what I have heard that if this amendment is adopted and the superintendent is given the opportunity to get rid of these 35 or 36 civilian instructors, the academy will be crippled.

Of course, I understand that when it comes to branches such as navigation, or some of those particular branches that are peculiarly related to the Navy, we want practical men, with practical knowledge; but a good part of the training which these young men get over here is training of their brains. When it comes to such subjects as modern languages, mathematics, physics, and many of those branches, the civilian is a better instructor than the officer, unless the officer has had the practical training.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Not in the least; I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I understand—the chairman of the committee can correct me if I am wrong—that in navigation there are no civilian instructors; they are all officers of the Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. In navigation? That may be so.

Mr. LODGE. Which is eminently proper.

Mr. POMERENE. I think so. The Senator and I do not differ in that behalf.

Mr. President, I have no interest in this matter. I think I am in the same position that other Senators are. I have from time to time designated certain young men to go to this academy for their training. I have an interest in them, as other Senators have in their young men, but above it all I have an interest in the Navy, and I want to know that these young men are getting the best instruction that it is possible to get for a reasonable amount of money; and this little paring down on the salaries of instructors is a poor investment when it comes to the training of the young men of the country.

For this reason I hope that both these Senate amendments—the one on line 18, page 52, and the one on page 53, lines 1 and 2—will be defeated.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland may be restated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will restate the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the proposed amendment of the committee at the top of page 53, the following proviso:

Provided, That in reducing the number of civilian professors all of the provisions of the contracts between the Government and the professors shall be generously fulfilled by the Government: Provided further, That no civilian professor who has been employed for three years or more shall be dismissed without a six months' notice to him that his services will no longer be needed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the terms of that amendment are so perfectly fair and clear and reasonable that there ought to be no question at all concerning its adoption.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland provides, I understand, first, that the Government of the United States shall keep its contracts. It really is rather an astounding situation that we have arrived at when it becomes necessary to say that that thing shall be done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POMERENE. Evidently, if they are to be dismissed regardless of their contracts, they should be given this notice; but let me call to the Senator's attention the fact that under the Senate amendment as proposed by the committee the number of civilian instructors can be reduced from 115 to 80, so that automatically they would be removed, if the superintendent so desired, upon the giving of the six months' notice.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that exactly as my colleague does, and I shall have some brief observations to make concerning it.

First, as to this particular proposition, however, I do not see how any Member of the Senate can stand upon this floor and say that the United States ought not to be compelled to live up to the terms of the contracts that it has made with these men. That is the first proposition that is involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with what the Senator from Ohio has said, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I should be very glad to see the amendment of the Senator from Maryland adopted. I do not think the United States can afford to be put in the position of breaking its contracts. The matter will have to go to conference and be dealt with there, and I should like to see the interests of the professors in those agreements protected.

Mr. WILLIS. I am very glad to hear the chairman of the committee say that. I understand, then, that the chairman is prepared to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland. Is that correct?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not bind the committee, but as far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept it.

Mr. WILLIS. As far as I am concerned, this discussion can terminate very quickly if the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. In order that we may be perfectly clear when we vote upon this amendment, I should like to inquire whether the understanding is that if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Maryland no instructor or professor at Annapolis will be discharged unless he has had six months' notice? In other words, I want to know whether this amendment is intended to cure any notice that might have been given some time ago, or whether the amendment intends that any instructor who shall be discharged in the future shall be given the six months' notice?

I should like to have the Senator from Maryland, who offered the amendment, answer that question.

Mr. WILLIS. Would it be just as agreeable to my friend from Louisiana to let me finish my brief statement, and then let the Senator from Maryland answer?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not object to that. I thought my inquiry was very pertinent at this time.

Mr. WILLIS. I should prefer to finish my brief statement, and let the Senator from Maryland answer subsequently.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Very well.

Mr. WILLIS. Since the acting chairman of the committee has advised us that as far as he is concerned he is perfectly willing to accept the amendment, there is no use discussing that any further; but while I am on my feet I want to say something about this general situation.

I have had a little experience with the conduct of schools myself. I know of a great many men, I have sat beneath the instruction of some men who knew their subjects, who knew astronomy, for example, or who knew a given language, but who did not have the capacity to teach it. It is no reflection upon a naval officer who has been at sea in command of a battleship for months, and perhaps for years, to say that he is not qualified to teach. He may know navigation; he may know integral calculus; he may know physics; he may know at least the theory of a foreign language, but I say to the Members of the Senate that coming from the command of a battleship directly into a great university—because that is what the academy is—he is not qualified to teach, because he does not have the pedagogical viewpoint. Therefore I think it would be a very great mistake if we should cut from the teaching force of this institution a large number of the civilian instructors.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. My colleague has had a great opportunity to familiarize himself with what is done in the colleges and high schools of the country. Am I right in my statement that in our first-class colleges and universities and high schools the teachers must have normal training, or something similar to it, or a large amount of experience?

Mr. WILLIS. That is true of such institutions in our State, and it is also true of the common schools. The teachers must have had special training as teachers.

Mr. POMERENE. And they are specially examined upon that subject.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly; and if it is proper to require that in the common schools of the country, as it is generally—at any rate in our State—surely the men who teach in a great university ought to have some special capacity as teachers. They might have information about the various subjects but not have much ability to teach.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I would like to ask one or the other of the Senators from Ohio, both of whom appear to be familiar with the question before the Senate, the ratio of the present number of civilian teachers to the undergraduate body, as compared with the ratio of civilian teachers to the undergraduate body in 1916, for example?

Mr. WILLIS. I am not prepared to answer that question. It is a very appropriate one, but I have not the information at hand. Perhaps the acting chairman of the committee can answer it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is there any member of the committee who can answer it? I am under the impression that the number of civilian teachers, in proportion to the total number of undergraduates, is rather larger than it was before the war, and that even though the number were somewhat reduced there would still be a higher proportion of civilian teachers than there was before the war.

Mr. WILLIS. If that be true it is distinctly to the advantage of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, because you will get better teaching from civilian teachers than you will from officer teachers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. There has of course been a great increase in the number of civilian instructors at the academy. I have been looking at the statement of Admiral Wilson in regard to it, which, I say, perfectly respectfully, is misleading. He begins with 1912, with 22 civilian instructors, and states that in 1913, 1914, and 1915 there were 26, that in 1916 there were 64, and that in 1917 there were 89 civilian instructors. That appears as if the whole change had been a result of the war and the consequent removal of the officers from the academy; and that is misleading. The fourth class in 1912 numbered 262, but in 1917 it numbered 744. The entire body of pupils had increased more than twice.

Mr. McCORMICK. More than threefold.

Mr. LODGE. More than threefold, in fact. The number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy at this moment is 2,392. That is very different from the time when the classes averaged 220, making a total of perhaps 800 at the academy. The instructing force must be increased to meet the increase in the number of the body of students. The war was not altogether responsible for the increase. Of course, there were a certain number of positions held by line officers which were necessarily vacated during the war, and those were filled with civilian instructors, necessarily.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to ask the junior Senator from Ohio if he thinks the proposed amendment will go to the fundamental objection raised by both his colleague and himself?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not think so. I do believe, however, that if the committee amendment should be adopted it would be very much better if it were modified by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland. Personally, I think the committee amendment should not be adopted, even if it is amended.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I know very little about naval affairs. I am on the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee dealing with this question, and I assented to the committee amendment we are now considering as it is contained in the bill, but I did so upon the ex parte statement of the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, who said to the subcommittee that by the dismissal of a part of the civilian force of instructors, and the substitution in their stead of naval officers as instructors, the efficiency of instruction would be improved, and there would be an actual economy of expenditure. In other words, he definitely said that we might save in the neighborhood of a quarter of a million dollars without impairing the efficiency of instruction at the academy.

Upon that mere statement there was nothing for the committee to do but to propose the amendment which has been presented; but upon subsequent inquiry and investigation I am convinced that the committee has made a mistake, and that we should not dismiss these civilian instructors, who are efficient, or substitute for them the class of instructors afforded by the detail of officers of the Navy from time to time.

I have read the debate which took place in the other branch of Congress, from which I gather that the instruction by these naval officers is totally inadequate, and at times absurd; that many of them are not instructors at all but that they simply command the student body to "man" the blackboard, and they take what appears on the blackboard and compare it with the textbooks, and in that crude way undertake to determine the capabilities of the students.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator permit a suggestion just there confirmatory of what he is so ably saying? The Senator will recall how these appointments are made. They pick out the best young men they can find in the several States; those young men are sent to Annapolis, they take the course there, and they go out in command of ships.

The probabilities are that the officers who are detailed from the Navy to teach have never in their lives, until they walk into the classrooms at Annapolis, essayed the task of teaching at all. When we demand experienced teachers in the public schools, why on earth should we say that in this great academy, which is the pride of the Nation, we should have experimental teaching?

Mr. GLASS. Some of those men barely pass their own examinations at the Naval Academy, and they acquire their official status by the skin of their teeth. It is not fair to assume that an officer of that sort, after being separated from the academy for 6 or 8 or 10 years, could go back there upon a detail and teach the student body of that institution in an efficient way.

It is quite embarrassing to me, after having assented in committee to this amendment, to have to seem to leave the committee when we get on the floor of the Senate; but I am thoroughly convinced that we made a mistake, and I shall not vote for the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall take no time in discussing the question raised by the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, which is a very proper amendment, of course. I know, as a matter of fact, that five-year contracts have been torn up and disregarded in certain cases, and I think the United States ought to make provision for keeping its contracts, or at least giving proper notice. But the acting chairman of the committee has accepted that amendment and I will not waste time on it. I wish to say a few general words in regard to the question which has been raised here and which has been so ably discussed, especially by the Senators who have been taking part in the debate, in regard to education.

The Naval Academy is an organization of higher learning; that is, it ranks with the universities. Of course, it is a specialized university, but that is its rank. I do not profess to be an expert in regard to methods of education, and I should not think of depending on what little I learned while I was actually a student at Harvard University to attempt to give an opinion, but since I graduated from that institution I have been a lecturer in the institution for three years, and I have also served for some 18 years on one of the governing boards, and I know something about the organization of the university and the appointments which are made and the principles which are followed in selecting professors, assistant professors, lecturers, and instructors. I want to put it to the Senate, or to anyone who is familiar with the management of a great university—for that is what the academy at Annapolis is—what would be thought of Harvard or Yale or Princeton or any other of our great colleges if every three years they turned out the professor or the instructor, or whatever he was?

A naval officer is assigned to duty at the Naval Academy to teach. He has his tour of duty there just as he has it in a navy yard or on board ship, or wherever he may have been sent. He has his tour of duty of three years. It is not conceivable that we can take a large section of the line of the Navy and turn them into professional instructors to remain permanently at Annapolis. They are educated to be officers of the line, officers of the staff, to control, manage, and direct the great military affairs of the Navy. Teaching is not their business. Naturally, except in their professional subjects, where, of course, they are the best instructors and where the fact that they are there only for three years is no disadvantage, they are not fitted to be instructors. The man who gives his life to teaching is necessarily the best instructor.

All colleges and all universities, so far as I am aware, make it a practice to keep through their lives distinguished professors, assistant professors, lecturers, and instructors. They endeavor to get men peculiarly fitted for the position. If we apply to the colleges the system that is proposed to be applied to the Naval Academy, the colleges ought to turn their professors out, not all at once, but each professor ought to go out at the end of three years and they ought to get in his place a new one who has had no experience whatever in teaching. Of course, that is absurd on the face of it.

Mr. GLASS. And to get a new one who has no adaptability and no capability for teaching.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely, and one who never has had any training in teaching whatever. Such subjects as modern languages, mathematics, physics, and the other subjects which are taught at the academy are not professional subjects. A man goes out from the Naval Academy highly educated and ranks according to his work in the academy. The first thing he does probably is to go off on a cruise for three years. He goes to all parts of the world. He is engaged in all sorts of duties.

Many of them take up specialties, of course, like ordnance and things of that kind, and have those assignments from time to time. But how many of them who go out with a good education and stand high in the academy have kept up their languages and their mathematics so that they can go back and teach? There are many highly educated men who graduate from our universities and who go out in the world and become lawyers or physicians or clergymen. They take up their different professions. On their special subjects they might go back and deliver a course of lectures, but a great deal of learning that is necessary in the instruction of boys who are students drops away from them. It is inevitable. No human brain can carry it all.

I think to make a wholesale reduction in the civilian professors is wrong. I do not think I know one of them. It seems to me a fault in the system of education to think of turning over the instruction of that great academy—I, of course, exclude always the professional branches—to a set of very brave, able, well-trained men who are not teachers. It is not their business in life to be teachers. To keep them there three years and then put in another equally untrained corps is a great mistake. I can not believe that out of such a system the young men could ever get a first-class education.

The standard of education at West Point and Annapolis has always been very high, and I am very anxious that it should remain very high. I think we shall get better education of the boys we send there—and we educate them at a cost which demands the best—if we follow the practice of every institution of learning in the world, and that is to get men to teach whose business it is to teach, and not shift men about. Among the civilian instructors who would think of taking the instructor in Spanish and set him to teaching mathematics? They get men not only trained in teaching, but trained in the special subjects. It is their special business. I shall be sorry to see anything done which would lower in the least the standard of education at Annapolis.

Before I close I call attention again to the fact that the great increase in the number of civilian instructors and of all instructors at the academy has not come exclusively from the war by any means, but by the great increase—tripling, indeed, the total number of students. We can get along with very many fewer instructors when we have only 600 or 800 than when we have 2,300 students.

Mr. GLASS. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that this is not a reduction in the aggregate at all. It is a reduction in the proportion of civilian teachers.

Mr. LODGE. That is very true. I am obliged to the Senator. They do not reduce the aggregate of teachers. They simply take men highly trained for a special profession and set them to teaching subjects of which they have only the general knowledge which they took away from the academy when they left it, men who have never done any instructing in their lives except in professional branches.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question for information?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have been told, but I know nothing of the matter, that they are topheavy in civilian instructors in view of the fact that there will be fewer students in the academy next year and the following year.

Mr. LODGE. If we reduce the number of students in the academy, of course the instructing body will be reduced, too; and it ought to be.

Mr. KING. Will there not be some reduction in the number of students during the coming year?

Mr. LODGE. I have assumed that there necessarily would be, because under the treaty we have reduced the size of the Navy. So there is no use in bringing in 700 new midshipmen, as they are going to do this year I believe.

Mr. KING. Will this bill perpetuate, unless we have some amendment, the same number of civilian teachers that have been there during the past?

Mr. LODGE. If the students are going to be reduced in number the teachers, of course, ought to be reduced, too.

Mr. KING. I was wondering, if there were no amendment to that effect, what the result would be.

Mr. LODGE. I am not a member of the committee which framed the bill, although I am a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that my information is that the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy for the ensuing year will be appreciably less than the number for the current year.

Mr. POMERENE. The current year was the peak year, I am advised.

Mr. LODGE. That is the fault of Congress, and Congress alone. Congress has enacted legislation allowing each Senator and each Representative so many nominees. As long as that law stands unamended the nominations will be made. The way to reduce the membership in the Naval Academy will be, of course, to reduce the number of nominations to be made by Senators and Representatives.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that it would take one year before the reaction is felt at the Naval Academy, because the appointments have been made now, and it will be at least one year before any change in the law would make itself felt at the academy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the more or less extended debate on this question. It seems to me that the difference, so far as the principle involved is concerned, between the Senators on the opposite sides of the question is more imaginary than real. The difference seems to be very largely a question as to whether we shall have one-half of the total number of instructors at the Naval Academy civilians, or whether we shall have only one-third. I do not understand that it is contended by any Senator that there should be no naval officers at all detailed as instructors at the Naval Academy. So the question very largely is to what extent civilians shall be employed for that purpose and what the ratio shall be.

At the present time there are about equal numbers of civilian instructors and officer instructors. There are exactly 118 civilian instructors, and I am informed there is the same number of officer instructors.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my information is, and I got it from a Member of the House who has given special attention to the subject, that the number of naval officers who are in the faculty is somewhere between 140 and 150.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I know that statement was made by a Member of the House of Representatives before the committee, but I have information from the department that I think is more accurate. I believe the error is probably due to the fact that the Representative referred to the total number of officers detailed to the academy. There are a number of officers detailed to the academy who are not instructors, but who are engaged in the work of the administration of academy affairs. That probably accounts for the difference.

I do not understand that it was proposed by the academy board to dismiss all the civilian instructors, but it was proposed to dismiss about 78 of the 118. I think that the Senate committee are very largely in agreement with most of what has been said upon both sides of the question, and they attempted to reconcile the apparent differences between the advocates of the different propositions by the amendment which they recommend to the bill.

The Senate committee are agreed that there ought to be a large or substantial element of civilian instructors at the academy. That is what is proposed by the advocates of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and those who have spoken in favor of civilian instructors. So the committee, in the face of the proposition of the superintendent of the academy to dismiss, as he proposed, 78 of the civilian instructors, put an amendment in the bill which would restrict him to separating from the service there only 38, and would require him, before any of the appropriations for the ensuing fiscal year as provided in the bill could be used, to keep at least 80 civilian instructors at the academy, which would be approximately one-third of the entire teaching force.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. Did the superintendent of the academy give the committee any reason why he proposes to dismiss 78 of the civilian instructors? What reason did he give for that action?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He went into that at considerable length, but most of his testimony was a statement of general principles. He went into a discussion of the fundamental purposes for which the academy was established and is conducted, namely, that it was for military instruction, that the special purpose of it was to turn out naval officers fitted to assume at once upon their graduation the duties of naval officers, and that it was impossible for them to be thoroughly trained and fitted for that purpose unless during the course of instruction they had the benefit of association with and instruction from naval officers, from men who had had actual experience in the naval service.

Mr. WILLIS. There was no question raised as to the capabilities of the civilian instructors proposed to be dismissed? He raised no question of that sort, did he?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He did raise a question as to some of them; but I do not think there would be any disagreement as to the proposition that none but efficient civilian instructors should be retained there.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much in sympathy with the proposition that the instructors in collegiate institutions ought not to be changed at frequent intervals. Certainly that is applicable to a great number of the subjects of instruction at the Naval Academy; but we believe if a positive requirement is put in the proposed law that at least one-third of the corps of instructors shall be civilians that that condition will be met.

There has been some discussion as to the question of economy. It has been pointed out that the pay of the naval officers who are detailed to instruct at the academy is larger than that of the civilian instructors. That is true, but nevertheless, by reason of the reduction in the number of civilians in the corps of instructors at the academy, if the committee amendment shall be adopted as recommended, the reduction in the appropriation made for instructors at the academy will be $100,000, and the bill will consequently carry $100,000 less of appropriations. That comes from the fact that whatever pay the naval officers are receiving, whether it is greater or smaller than the civilian instructors receive, they will receive anyway whether they are detailed to give instructions at the Naval Academy or detailed for service at some shore station or upon board a ship. There is not any additional expense entailed upon the Government by having them act as instructors at the academy.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to a relative comparison of the number of civilian instructors at the academy in previous years and the present time. In 1912 there were 878 midshipmen at the academy and 22 civilian instructors. That was a ratio of one civilian instructor for every 39 midshipmen. In 1922—the current year—there were 2,392 midshipmen at the academy and 118 civilian instructors, or a ratio of 1 civilian instructor for every 20 midshipmen, there being approximately double the relative number of civilian instructors as compared with the number of midshipmen under instruction in 1922 as there were in 1912.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator explain the reason why there was such a great increase, thus changing the ratio so materially?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The reason given, and undoubtedly one of the important factors entering into the result, was the World War. That is the reason given by Admiral Wilson. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], so far as I heard his remarks, said that the statement of Admiral Wilson was somewhat misleading. I do not think it was misleading, if one takes into consideration and modifies it by the obvious condition which, of course, Admiral Wilson intended should be taken into consideration. Not only have the number of civilian instructors been increased by reason of the increased number of midshipmen from the number that were at the academy before the war to the number that were there in 1922 but the relative number of civilian instructors has been doubled, as I have pointed out. That can only be explained by reason of the circumstance to which Admiral Wilson calls attention, that about 1916, when we began to prepare for the war—and the effect continued as we drew closer to war—naval officers at the academy were sent into active service on board ship, and before we entered the war a large number of them were detailed to man batteries which we placed upon merchant vessels in pursuance of the joint resolution adopted by Congress of so-called armed neutrality.

The proposition as contained in the bill as it comes to us from the House is that the condition at the academy which resulted from the war shall not be changed, notwithstanding the fact that in every line of governmental activity, and especially in the Army and the Navy, we are endeavoring to get back to a pre-war condition or to the normal condition—at least, relatively speaking—which existed prior to the war.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in a moment.

The bill as it comes from the House would prevent the academy board from reducing at all the number of civilian instructors at the academy. The only change which the Senate committee have made in that is that the academy authorities shall be limited in reducing the number of civilian instructors at the academy so that they shall not be reduced below the number of 80, which, as I have already said, will be about one-third of the total corps of instructors. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Then, if we pass the bill in the form in which it came from the House it will perpetuate the policy that obtained during the war and compel the naval authorities to retain the civilian instructors there when they are not needed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly. Here is the language of the bill:

> No part of any sum in this act appropriated shall be expended in the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Navy detailed for duty as professor or instructor at the United States Naval Academy to perform the duties which were performed—

Here is the significant part of it—

> by civilian professors or instructors on January 1, 1922.

That is, the number of civilian instructors who were there on January 1, 1922—the absolute number and the relative number occasioned by the war—can not be changed.

I agree to practically everything that has been said here as to the shortcomings and the deficiencies of naval officers as instructors and as to the necessity of observing the ordinary rules and the ordinary practice which governs the selection of professors at colleges, but at the same time we must recognize the practical condition that the Naval Academy is not an ordinary college and that if we should apply those principles which have been held up here as the model which ought to be followed in the course of instruction at the Naval Academy we would destroy it as a naval and as a military institution and make it a civil institution.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, how could that be done when we are retaining in the service there as instructors 133 naval officers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator did not appreciate exactly what I said. I said that if we followed the model which has been held up in the debate by certain Senators, the practice followed in civilian colleges, it would have the effect which I just stated. Of course it would not have that effect if one-half of the number of instructors there are naval officers. So we come down to a comparatively minor question, which is the only practical question involved in this amendment, as to whether one-half of them shall be civilian instructors or one-third of them civilian instructors.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has indicated that he accepts nearly everything that has been said here. Much has been said here as to the superiority, as a rule, of civilian instructors as compared with naval officers as instructors. I believe the Senator will agree with that proposition as to most of the branches of learning taught at the academy, except purely technical ones. I recognize the fact that if there is a need for 200 instructors there ought not to be 225. If the purpose is to reduce the number of instructors, let us make the reduction in the number of naval officer instructors, who are, I think, in the minds of four out of five who go over there, concededly incompetent as instructors. Let us decapitate some of them and send them some place where they can be useful.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course the number of instructors there, both civilian and naval, ought to be reduced to meet the needs of the academy from time to time, and that undoubtedly will be done, but it can not be done for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. POMERENE. But the superintendent of the academy, according to the Senator's own statement, comes before the Naval Committee with a proposition to cut off the heads of 78 out of the 118 civilian instructors.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But he can not do it under the terms of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. It is a most amazing proposition to come from the head of such an institution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion to see if we can not settle this question in a manner which is fair both to the instructors and to the Government. One bad feature of the House provision is that it compels every civilian professor there to be retained whether he should be retained or not, and precludes the assignment of a naval officer to take his place. It will compel the academy authorities to continue for the next year all of the 115 civilian instructors. If an instructor is inefficient the Government ought not to be compelled to retain him and be prevented from putting a naval officer in his place. Admiral Wilson, I think, is desirous of making the academy entirely too military. Some of the civilian instructors are absolutely necessary. We did send the naval officers away from the academy during the war to take charge of ships and do the fighting, so that many civilian instructors were appointed there who otherwise would not have been appointed. It seems to me that if we could accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] one phase of the situation would be taken care of. No civilian instructor who went to the academy under a contract, implied or otherwise, ought to be treated badly.

The amendment of the committee on page 52, line 18, proposes to reduce the appropriation for pay of professors and instructors from $421,500 to $321,500. If we were to increase that to $371,000 it would still leave the superintendent free to get rid, if he sees fit, of some of the instructors. He ought to have, to some extent, an opportunity to get rid of some of them, if they are not efficient and are not adapted to the work; but we ought not to let him bring about the complete revolution that he indicated he would in connection with the instruction corps there.

My suggestion to the Senator would be to accept the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. I think that is right. I think when this Government enters into a contract, express or implied, with anybody, it ought to fulfill it honestly, and I think it ought to be a model of honesty and fair dealing, even if it has not got a contract. This Government has no right to invite people to leave colleges and homes and become teachers at the academy and then kick them out unmercifully. The Government ought to be a model of fair dealing. If, instead of saying "$321,000" we should say "$371,000," that would give leeway to the superintendent to get rid of about 8 or 10 professors, if he sees fit, but it will have to go to conference anyway. I think that would be a fair settlement of it. I am not satisfied with it now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The whole matter will go to conference under this amendment and under the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, which I think is very meritorious. I do not think any man's contract ought to be violated by the United States. The United States is the last institution in the world which ought to ignore the obligations of a contract, because its business is to enforce the obligations of the people legally subject to it, and it ought not to set a bad example in its own contracts; but when that amendment is adopted the effect that is suggested by the Senator from Virginia will come into play, and the whole question will be in conference.

There is just one more word I want to say, and that is that even with the reduced number of civilian instructors, even with the proportion one-half what it is now, the Naval Academy earned its position as the foremost naval military school in the world, and turned out a corps of officers who are regarded the world around as inferior to none in their training and equipment for the business for which this institution is established. There is no proof like the results of a system. When we see the results of the system that has existed there, it is very difficult by mere a priori reasoning, mere theory, to say that it ought to be overturned.

Mr. SWANSON. My idea of having "$371,000" put in, so that when it went to conference there would not be a difference of more than $50,000, is that it would give an assurance to the Senate that these instructors there, even as the result of the conference, could not be harshly dealt with, because this amount of $300,000 would be appropriated for this purpose and could not be diverted to any other. If this appropriation were $321,000, they might agree to the provisions contained in this amendment; but if you name $371,000 and have only $50,000 in conference, the Senate has an assurance, clear and explicit, by what is involved in the conference, that these professors will not be dealt with harshly, except a few of them that they might get rid of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the purpose of this is not to reduce the total number of instructors. There is no such plan as that. The plan is to keep the number of instructors precisely the same, but to turn out civilians and to put in naval officers.

Mr. SWANSON. No; if the Senator will permit me, the effect of this is that they can not turn out a single one of the civilian instructors and put a naval officer in his place.

Mr. LODGE. I am not speaking of the House bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I am talking about the House bill, and that is why I think it ought to be modified. They have 115 instructors, and under the provision of the House bill they can not get rid of a single one of them, no matter how incompetent they may be, because they could not substitute them with naval officers.

Mr. LODGE. But this is my point: I am speaking of the purpose of this whole business.

Mr. SWANSON. Wait, now.

Mr. LODGE. The purpose is to make places for naval officers. That is the purpose. The teaching force is not reduced at all.

Mr. SWANSON. No; the number of instructors is not reduced. It is simply a question of taking the pay that would go to a naval officer otherwise and reducing this appropriation by that much. It does not save any money to the Government, provided these naval officers are needed elsewhere, because they are at work. My proposition to the Senator is this: I do think that the House provision is too harsh, because it would not allow them to get rid of a single civilian professor, because they are prohibited from substituting a naval officer in place of any civilian instructor who was there on the 1st of January, 1922.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; and the statement the Senator has just made gives the whole thing away. If they want to reduce the force they can dismiss civilians.

Mr. SWANSON. No; I say we ought to give them the privilege of dismissing a limited number—10 or 5 or 6.

Mr. LODGE. And keeping naval officers in the same places.

Mr. SWANSON. I would not like to be the superintendent of an academy and be told that if I have 115 civilian instructors there, whether I like a single one of them or not, and regardless of their efficiency, I can not get rid of a single one of them.

Mr. LODGE. I should not like to be under a superintendent of an academy who I am informed is going to turn out——

Mr. SWANSON. I think you go too far and Admiral Wilson goes too far. I was trying to get a settlement of it which would leave him only a very limited number to get rid of.

Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has no right to farm out the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Louisiana desired to ask me a question, and I had the floor.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia this question: If there were 1 or 2 or 3 or 5 or 10 or 15 of the 115 civilian instructors at Annapolis who do not suit the admiral, there is no harm in permitting him to dismiss a civilian instructor and employing another civilian instructor. What we object to is permitting him to discharge a trained civilian instructor and taking a man and calling him an instructor who has been out of touch with educational work for the last 10 or 15 years.

Mr. SWANSON. This is the effect of it: It simply means that for all time to come, if this provision continues, they shall keep at the Naval Academy 115 civilian instructors, notwithstanding that number were made necessary there only by war conditions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield, there is no difference in principle between the Senator from Virginia and myself and other Senators, so far as I can see. I am willing to accept, so far as I can, the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Virginia probably will be on the conference committee. Why not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, and adopt the amendment as amended, and let the matter go to conference, where it can be worked out upon some satisfactory basis in accordance with the principles which are generally agreed to?

Mr. SWANSON. My suggestion was, in order to make it a little safer that we are going to have more civilian instructors than we would have with this amount reduced $100,000, to increase the amount from $321,000 to $371,000, and that would compel us to have more than 80 civilians.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That would all be in conference.

Mr. SWANSON. But if this should be fixed now, the conference could not lessen it. The conference could lessen it down to $321,000; it would not be in conference except to that extent, for $50,000; and if it is only in conference for $50,000, it would be a very small item there.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to know just exactly the situation of this amendment. As I understand, there are a large number of civilians there now—more than 100—perhaps more than are necessary. If we pass the House bill, the hands of the commandant or the person in charge are absolutely tied and we are compelled to retain those civilians whether they are competent or incompetent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is correct—not necessarily those civilians, but an equal number.

Mr. KING. Well, an equal number. There are some civilians, in my opinion, from what I have been told, whose services could be dispensed with for the good of the service and the good of the young men whom they teach. I have no doubt that is true as to some of the officers; but to say that the officer in charge is compelled to retain a certain number of civilians whether he will or no seems to me to be absurd. I think it is unwise policy to put into the law a provision that a certain number of civilians must be employed there whether they are needed or whether they are not needed, and that the person in charge of the academy shall have no discretion whatever, no power to dismiss them or to discharge them or to dispense with their services.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me just complete this thought, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia. I am not, however, in sympathy with what I conceive to be one angle of this case, namely, we have now more than 4,400 officers. We do not need that many, of course, for a personnel of 86,000 in the Navy. We have to furnish them jobs. They will be misfits as to many of them. We will put some of those misfits in the Naval Academy.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. KING. I am not in sympathy with that policy, either. Of course, we need some naval officers there, but we perhaps do not need all that will be sent there.

Permit me to yield to the Senator from Virginia first; then I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, there is nothing in the testimony to indicate that these civilians are not needed there, or at least there is nothing in the testimony to indicate that the numerical strength of the existing corps of teachers should be reduced at all, and it is not proposed to reduce in the aggregate the strength of the teaching corps. It is simply proposed to get rid of civilians who can teach, and put in their stead naval officers who can not teach. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator from Virginia assumes that all of the civilians who are there can teach.

Mr. GLASS. If they can not, they ought to be turned out. There is nothing in the law to prohibit turning out an incompetent professor.

Mr. KING. I do not know, as to that, whether there is or not.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. I do not know whether the House bill permits the discharge of a civilian employee or not.

Now I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the bill has stated that the number of civilian instructors which this amendment absolutely requires would be about one-third of the teaching staff at the academy. As bearing on that question——

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not quite hear the first part of his sentence. Do I understand him to say that there are too many teachers there now for the midshipmen who will be there?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No; but on the basis of the academy's size at present, if there were 80 civilian instructors, it would be about one-third of the teaching staff. As bearing on that question, I have a rough estimate of the amount of hours per week of various subjects, which I thought would be interesting in connection with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad to have the Senator present it.

Mr. NEWBERRY. We realize that there are some studies at a naval academy that require naval officers, trained in naval subjects, to teach, to the exclusion of civilians, altogether. They are gunnery, seamanship, navigation, engineering, and electricity.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator does not think that that is not realized by those who have been discussing this question? I stated explicitly that there were no civilian instructors in navigation, for instance.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I was not arguing about that. I was going to put in the number of hours, so that we would know about what proportion of people would be required.

Mr. LODGE. I have referred to that so many times that I wondered that the Senator was speaking as if he thought we ought to know that there are naval officers teaching there. There are 140.

Mr. NEWBERRY. There may be some people who do not know it, and we would like to have a record of this, if the Senator does not object.

Mr. LODGE. I should like very much to hear the number of hours, but I should also like to hear who the instructors are.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The names of them?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; the subjects.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I was just trying to give that when the Senator spoke to me. The hours devoted to gunnery, navigation, engineering, seamanship, and electricity are about 35 a week.

Mr. LODGE. Those are all professions.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Those all require naval officers.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; those are all professions.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The hours devoted to other subjects—languages, mathematics, physics, chemistry, and so forth—are about 23 a week. I just mention it because it is interesting to note that the amount of hours requiring professional teachers and those requiring civilian teachers about equal the estimate the committee made as to the relative number of civilian instructors.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, let me see if I understand the significance of his statement. As I understand, a certain number of hours of instruction each day or each week are given to each pupil. That bears the ratio of 35 of gunnery and navigation instruction, seamanship, and so forth, which would be given by officers, to 23 hours, which would be given by civilian instructors.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, if you should have civilians doing all of the work which is ordinarily taught in colleges by civilians you would still need more officers than civilians, and the ratio which the two would bear to each other would be as 23 is to 35, and that does not take into account the other instruction to which the Senator has referred. Has the Senator any figures showing the number of hours devoted to those other kinds of instruction?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I would like to correct these figures later if I am in error, but the best estimate I can get is that, outside of the 35 hours mentioned, for those subjects I think the hours are about 10 for gunnery, 12½ for navigation, about 12½ for engineering, 5 for languages, and 6 hours a week each given to mathematics, physics, and chemistry.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know how many hours are given to military discipline, calisthenics, and so forth?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Twenty-four. I think they are under military discipline all the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. The pending amendment is, on page 52, line 2, after the words "United States," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in reducing the number of civilian professors all of the provisions of the contracts between the Government and the professors shall be generously fulfilled by the Government: Provided further, That no civilian professor who has been employed for three years or more shall be dismissed without a six months' notice to him that his service will no longer be needed.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], I would say that, in my judgment, this would protect all professors who have not actually been discharged from the academy, even though they may have received notice, because even after having received notice they are still professors. If they are professors at the time this legislation passes, they will, in my judgment, be protected by the provisions of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator will bear in mind that the present number of civilian instructors is 118, as given by the acting chairman of the committee, and under the amendment proposed by the committee itself the authorities would be permitted to reduce that number from 118 to 80, so that it would give to the superintendent the right to eliminate 38, subject to the provisions of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. FRANCE. Subject to the provisions of my amendment; so that the civilian instructors would be protected by contract.

Mr. POMERENE. I would like to know what the committee is going to work out. I realize that there ought to be some latitude given to the authorities there.

Mr. LODGE. I was very much interested in the figures of the Senator from Michigan, and as I have no confidence in my own mathematics, I would like to ask the Senator whether I am correct?

It has been reported that there are from 140 to 150 officers there. I take the lowest number, 118 naval instructors, teaching 35 hours a week each. There are 118 civilians, teaching 23 hours a week each. I may be wrong in my figures.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Out of the 140 naval officers, 118 are doing classroom work; the others are doing military training, and attending to other functions.

Mr. LODGE. I got the numbers from the acting chairman of the committee.

Mr. NEWBERRY. One hundred and forty officers are on duty in the academy, 118 doing classroom work.

Mr. LODGE. There are some who do no teaching at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think we omitted to act on the amendment on line 18, page 52.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 52, line 18, the committee proposes to strike out "$421,500" and to insert in lieu thereof "$321,500," so as to read:

Pay of professors and instructors, including one professor as librarian, $321,500.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, at this point I would ask that the clerks at the desk be authorized and instructed to correct the totals wherever made necessary by any changes in amount in the various items. I notice that an error was made in one of the totals in the printing of the bill as it came to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SWANSON. I have offered an amendment to increase the amount allowed in the committee amendment to $371,500. I think that would take care of the situation, so that we would have enough leeway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, the Senator from Virginia moves to strike out "$421,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$371,500."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope that amendment will be rejected and that the committee amendment as proposed will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask for a division on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I am going to assume, even if this committee amendment is adopted, that the conferees are going to try to work this thing out in a way that will do justice to these professors. It seems to me that it would be a good deal better if we could have a roll call on this subject, but I am not going to ask for that. I understood that the Senator from Louisiana was going to ask for a division.

Mr. WARREN. This matter will go to conference, and it can be settled there.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Louisiana asked for a division on the question as to whether the $321,000 should be increased to $371,000.

Mr. LODGE. That was voted down.

Mr. SWANSON. It was not understood, and the Senator from Louisiana asked for a division.

Mr. LODGE. It was rejected on a viva voce vote.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Louisiana asked for a division on the question as to whether it should be $371,000 instead of $321,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia was the author of the amendment, and will, no doubt, be a member of the conference. It seems to me, as has been said by the chairman of the subcommittee, this whole thing can be handled entirely in conference. The conferees can make it $324,500 or any sum up to the amount fixed by the House.

Mr. SWANSON. They could do it, but I think the Senate would be better satisfied if we had this leeway. However, I have no objection to that course being followed. I am willing to let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 15, to reduce the total appropriation for pay of professors and others, Naval Academy, from "$481,400" to "$456,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 24, to strike out "$826.73" and insert "$826.78," so as to make the paragraph read:

Department of seamanship: Three coxswains, at $1,176.88 each; three seamen, at $1,001.60 each; two seamen, at $826.78 each; in all, $8,189.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 21, to reduce the total of the appropriation for civil establishment from "$926,261" to "$901,261."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 17, to reduce the total appropriation for Naval Academy, exclusive of public works, from "$2,154,461" to "$2,129,461."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Marine Corps," on page 56, line 22, after the words "reserve list," to strike out the comma and "$3,374,842" and insert "pay, $3,367,630, subsistence allowance, $482,000, rental allowance, $750,000; in all, $4,599,630," so as to make the paragraph read:

PAY, MARINE CORPS.

Pay of officers, active and reserve list: For pay and allowances prescribed by law for all officers on the active and reserve list, pay, $3,367,630, subsistence allowance, $482,000, rental allowance, $750,000; in all, $4,599,630.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not permit this amendment to go over until to-morrow. I have two amendments to offer, one to reduce the number of the marines and the other to limit the appropriation in this respect: That no part of the appropriation shall be employed in maintaining the marines either in Haiti or Santo Domingo beyond the 1st of January of next year.

Mr. POINDEXTER. These amendments would be in order after the committee amendments have been disposed of. If the Senator will allow us to go ahead and act upon these, I would be very glad to agree that his amendments may be submitted, and if adopted any changes consequent on a vote upon his amendment shall be made.

Mr. KING. The point I had in mind was that I would speak upon the other amendment limiting the number of marines at the same time I was considering this one, so as to expedite the passage of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. These are just formal amendments to comply with the existing law. Of course, if there is adopted by the Senate an amendment reducing the number of marines it would follow as a matter of course that we would all agree to reduce these items.

Mr. KING. With that understanding, I have no objection to proceeding with these amendments. I shall offer an amendment reducing the number of marines to 15,000, and if I am defeated in that I shall offer one reducing the number of marines to 17,500.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator expect to do that to-day?

Mr. KING. I can do that to-morrow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, at the beginning of line 18, to strike out "$10,817,398" and to insert a dash and the following words, "pay, $10,817,398; allowance for lodging and subsistence, $1,048,974; in all, $11,866,372"; so as to make the paragraph read:

Pay of enlisted men, active and reserve list: For pay and allowances of noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as prescribed by law, and for the expenses of clerks of the United States Marine Corps traveling under orders, and including additional compensation for enlisted men of the Marine Corps qualified as expert riflemen, sharpshooters, marksmen, or regularly detailed as gun captains, gun pointers, cooks, messmen, signalmen, or holding good-conduct medals, pins, or bars, including interest on deposits by enlisted men, post-exchange debts of deserters, under such rules as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and the authorized travel allowance of discharged enlisted men, and for prizes for excellence in gunnery exercises and target practice, and for pay of enlisted men designated as Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks, both afloat and ashore—pay, $10,817,398; allowance for lodging and subsistence, $1,048,974; in all, $11,866,372.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 21, to increase the appropriation for pay and allowances prescribed by law of enlisted men on the retired list from "$227,046" to "$305,938."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 58, to strike out:

COMMUTATION OF QUARTERS.

For commutation of quarters for enlisted men on recruiting duty, for officers and enlisted men serving with or without troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, for enlisted men employed as clerks and messengers in the offices of the commandant, adjutant and inspector, paymaster, and quartermaster, and the offices of the assistant adjutant and inspectors, assistant paymasters, assistant quartermasters, at $21 each per month, and for enlisted men employed as messengers in said offices, at $10 each per month, $670,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 17, to increase the total appropriation for pay, Marine Corps, from "$15,989,945" to "$17,672,599."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 23, to strike out "commutation of rations to enlisted men regularly detailed as clerks and messengers;"; on page 60, line 2, after the word "subsistence," to strike out the comma and the words "or in lieu of board, commutation of rations to recruiting parties, and enlisted men traveling on special duty, at such rate as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe," and, at the end of line 7, to strike out "$3,380,947" and insert "$3,011,519," so as to make the paragraph read:

MAINTENANCE, QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT, MARINE CORPS.

PROVISIONS, MARINE CORPS.

For enlisted men serving ashore; subsistence and lodging of enlisted men when traveling on duty, or cash in lieu thereof; payments of board and lodging of applicants for enlistment while held under observation, recruits, recruiting parties, and enlisted men where it is impracticable otherwise to furnish subsistence; ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for offices and preservation of rations, $3,011,519.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Fuel, Marine Corps," on page 60, line 12, after the word "heat," to strike out the comma and insert "and"; in the same line, after the word "light," to strike out "and commutation thereof"; and, at the end of line 16, to strike out "$850,000" and insert "$700,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men, and other buildings and grounds pertaining to the Marine Corps; fuel, electricity, and oil for cooking, power, and other purposes; and sales to officers, $700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 2, after the name "Marine Corps," to strike out "$8,993,577" and insert "$8,474,149," so as to make the paragraph read:

In all, for the maintenance of Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps, $8,474,149; and the money herein specifically appropriated for the maintenance of the Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps, shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with the existing law as maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps; and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 9, to increase the total appropriation for the Marine Corps, exclusive of public works, from "$24,983,522" to "$26,146,748."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Increase of the Navy," on page 64, line 16, after the word "destroyers," to insert "together with the sum of $10,000,000, which is hereby appropriated,"; in line 18, after the word "date," to insert "including the U. S. S. Maryland"; on page 65, line 5, after the word "Department," to strike out "for the completion of torpedoes under manufacture on April 8, 1922, not to exceed 400," and to insert "for the procurement of gyro compass equipments for destroyers not already supplied; for the completion of armor, armament, ammunition, and of torpedoes under manufacture on April 8, 1922, including not to exceed 400 of the destroyer type"; and on page 65, line 12, after the word "instruments," to strike out "on the U. S. S. Maryland and," so as to make the paragraph read:

The Secretary of the Navy may use interchangeably the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "Increase of the Navy," including any balance then remaining under the appropriation "Increase of the Navy, torpedo boat destroyers," together with the sum of $10,000,000, which is hereby appropriated, for the prosecution of work on vessels under construction on such date, including the U. S. S. Maryland, the construction of which may be proceeded with under the terms of the treaty providing for the limitation of naval armament, concluded on February 6, 1922, published in Senate Document No. 126 of the present session; for the conversion into aircraft carriers, including their complete equipment of aircraft and aircraft accessories, in accordance with the terms of such treaty, two of the battle cruisers the construction of which had been heretofore commenced, when the conversion of such battle cruisers shall have been authorized; for the settlement of contracts on account of vessels already delivered to the Navy Department; for the procurement of gyro compass equipments for destroyers not already supplied; for the completion of armor, armament, ammunition, and of torpedoes under manufacture on April 8, 1922, including not to exceed 400 of the destroyer type; and for the installation of fire-control instruments on 12 destroyers heretofore constructed, and such balances shall not be available for any other purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the committee amendments except those passed over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, under instruction of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 64, line 17, after the word "appropriated" it is proposed to insert:

and in addition thereto such amount, not exceeding $8,000,000, as may be realized by the Navy Department, by application upon the obligations of the Navy Department for "Increase of the Navy" from any assignment, such assignment being hereby authorized, by the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to the Navy Department of any obligation or debt or of any note or other securities held as security therefor owing to the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation or to the United States by any contractor or subcontractor to whom the Navy Department may be obligated on account of supplies furnished or work done on account of "Increase of the Navy."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator will withdraw the point of order. I doubt very much whether it would lie anyhow. I would like to inquire of the Senator if he has any objection, regardless of the point of order, where a contractor is indebted to the United States——

Mr. KING. I want an explanation from the Senator. I have not yet seen the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The effect of it is simply that where a contractor is indebted to the United States Shipping Board, and consequently to the United States, the United States, through the Navy Department, being indebted to that same contractor, may balance one obligation against the other. That is all there is to it. It furnishes a means by which the United States can collect perhaps in some cases what it is owing to it which otherwise it could not collect.

Mr. KING. It is a credit to the Navy Department in a way?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It authorizes the Navy Department to credit upon its obligations to contractors obligations which those contractors owe to the United States through another agency.

Mr. KING. Are there cases where there are dual transactions, one with the Navy Department and one with the Shipping Board?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has the amendment been approved by the committee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has been approved by the full Committee on Appropriations, and also, I understand, approved by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who was interested in the matter. The committee instructed the Senator from Wisconsin and myself to confer about it, which we have done.

Mr. KING. Has it been approved by members of the Committee on Commerce? For instance, has the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] approved it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He approves it. He was present at the time the instruction was given.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think there should be one addition to the statement which the Senator from Washington has made.

I will say to the Senator from Utah that I objected to the amendment as originally framed, because it permitted the Navy Department, as I construed it, to sell obligations for cash and then apply the cash upon new construction. I was willing, wherever the Shipping Board was willing, to assign to the Navy Department an obligation that some one owes it and the Navy Department also owed that same party, to permit the Shipping Board to assign a sufficient amount of that obligation to offset the claim the same party had against the Navy Department. I will say it can only be done with the consent of the Shipping Board. They must first make an assignment to the Navy Department of the obligation, and then it can be offset against the obligation of the Navy Department to the contractor.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether, under the modus operandi prescribed here, money might be paid into the Shipping Board from the Navy Department and the Shipping Board utilize it without the consent of Congress?

Mr. LENROOT. No; this is not a payment of that kind at all, as I understand it. For instance, here is a shipyard that is indebted to the Shipping Board. The Navy Department is indebted to that shipyard. In that case the amendment will permit the Shipping Board to assign to the Navy its claim against the shipyard, and the Navy Department can then apply that in payment of its obligation to the shipyard.

Mr. KING. Then, there is no process by which the Shipping Board can get money out of the Treasury and the credit go to the Navy Department?

Mr. LENROOT. This is merely to permit the assignment by the Shipping Board of obligations to it to the Navy Department to be applied upon indebtedness of the Navy Department to the same party, as I understand it.

Mr. KING. I have no objection. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it will be necessary first to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, of which this is a part, was agreed to. Without objection, the vote by which that amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington on behalf of the committee to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER subsequently said:

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] this morning, being compelled to leave the Senate, asked me to present to the Senate and have read by the Secretary a brief letter which relates to an amendment, which I offered on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations relating to the exchange of claims between the Shipping Board and the Navy Department. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read the letter, and that it be printed in the RECORD immediately following the action of the Senate upon the amendment referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read the letter, as follows:

GROTON, CONN., June 16, 1922.

Hon. F. B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: While the naval appropriation bill was before the subcommittee, the inclosed provision was inserted in the bill under "Increase of the Navy," at the request of Assistant Secretary Roosevelt. His idea was to take over from the Shipping Board the notes of the Submarine Boat Corporation for the use by the Navy Department in paying the Electric Boat Co. for past and future work. This idea is entirely impracticable, and if it were put in force it would necessarily result in our shutting down the plant at Groton.

This provision was stricken out by the full committee and is not now in the bill. I do not know that any attempt will be made to restore it on the floor. If so, however, I will very much appreciate anything that you might be able to do to prevent such restoration.

Very sincerely yours,

L. Y. SPEAR.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

* * * and in addition thereto such amount as may be realized by the Navy Department, either in cash or by application upon the obligations of the Navy Department for "Increase of the Navy" from any assignment by the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to the Navy Department of any obligation or debt, or of any note or other securities held as security therefor owing to the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation or to the United States by any contractor or subcontractor to whom the Navy Department may be obligated on account of supplies furnished or work done on account of "Increase of the Navy." * * *

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, I wish to offer a small verbal amendment. In line 1, on page 65, after the words "battle cruisers" I move to insert "namely, the Lexington and the Saratoga," so that it will read:

Two of the battle cruisers, namely, the Lexington and the Saratoga, the construction of which had been heretofore commenced, etc.

I move the amendment because the naval board on scrapping, whose report I have here as submitted to the Congress, in their recommendation No. 7 say:

The board recommends that the two most advanced battle cruisers, namely, the Lexington, No. 1, and the Saratoga, No. 3, be selected for conversion into airplane carriers.

The authorization will come in a subsequent bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I trust that the amendment will be adopted. I think it is a very meritorious one. The Lexington and the Saratoga are the battle cruisers farthest advanced in construction. They are the ones which the naval conference, at the limitation of arms conference, had in view. On the Lexington 33.8 per cent of work has been done and on the Saratoga 35.4 per cent. The nearest approach to those battle cruisers of any other in progress is the Constellation, on which only 22.7 per cent of work has been done. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts should be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that we may now return to the amendment passed over on page 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 31, line 3, the committee proposes to strike out:

That no part of this appropriation or any other appropriation contained in this act shall be available for expenditure at the Naval Proving Ground, Dahlgren, Va., except so much as may be necessary to maintain the station on a closed-down basis.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] is interested in this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether we are through with committee amendments?

Mr. LODGE. Except some that were passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two committee amendments yet to be disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to offer an amendment, if it is permissible at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. There are two committee amendments that have not been disposed of.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The only committee amendment that I desire to have considered this evening is the one just stated, on page 31, striking out lines 3 to 7, inclusive. When that is disposed of other amendments will be in order. There is one other committee amendment passed over, but I shall ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, is it the intention of the Senator in charge of the bill to remain in session for some little time yet?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the notice which was given this morning. At this time, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to dispose of this one amendment this evening.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator from Washington will permit me, I wish to introduce an amendment to which I think there will be no objection. I would like also to dispose of that this evening.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is entirely satisfactory for the Senator to present his amendment.

Mr. EDGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the pending bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 6, after line 12, insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That quarantine and passport fees collected in the Virgin Islands shall hereafter be paid into the treasuries of said islands."

Mr. KING. Has the Senator from New Jersey offered his amendment?

Mr. EDGE. I have submitted my amendment; but the Senator in charge of the bill has suggested that the committee amendments which have been passed over should be first considered.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not press his amendment to-night, because I would like to have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. EDGE. The amendment I am offering I am quite sure will not create any objection at all. I am simply waiting until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I suggest that we proceed with the committee amendment now pending.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the order of the Senate, as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement committee amendments are to be disposed of first. The amendment now before the Senate is the first amendment passed over, on page 31, which has been stated.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to make what I hope will be a very short statement on the amendment. I thought my statement might provoke some debate, and it was with that in mind that I asked the Senator in charge of the bill whether he wished to have the Senate continue in session until the amendment is disposed of. While the statement which I desire to make on the amendment will not consume much time, I believe that it may lead to some debate. I wondered whether the Senator desired to continue until the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to proceed with the one amendment at least.

Mr. FRANCE. Personally, I am very anxious to have the whole bill disposed of as speedily as possible, so I shall make the statement which I had in mind to make concerning the amendment.

The amendment really involves a large question of governmental policy. It is useless for us to expect a reduction of governmental expenditures unless we secure a reduction in the number of governmental activities which were inaugurated during the war. I have taken a particular interest in the question of proving grounds. My particular interest in this question arises out of the fact that at the beginning of the war it was deemed necessary by the War Department to secure a proving ground somewhere in the neighborhood of Washington. It was proposed at that time to establish a proving ground on Kent Island, on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. The opposition to the establishment of a proving ground on Kent Island, however, was so pronounced that my then colleague, Senator Smith, and myself opposed it, and the proposal to take Kent Island for a proving ground was abandoned.

Upon that occasion, when the matter of a proving ground was under discussion, I learned that there was a proving ground available for the Government in New Jersey. Prior to the war we had very inadequate proving ground facilities, but after the beginning of the European war one of the great ordnance companies purchased in New Jersey, after much effort, a proving ground which had a range of 14 miles. That proving ground was offered to the Government free of charge for governmental use, and I believe it is possible even now for the Government to secure the use of that 14-mile range without any substantial charge being made to the Government.

My point is that there was at that time, and there is to-day, available a proving ground with a range of 14 miles in New Jersey available for Government uses.

However, while the proposal to take Kent Island for a proving ground was abandoned, nevertheless the determination of the War Department to have an additional proving ground was so fixed that finally a proving ground was established at Aberdeen, Md., a proving ground embracing, I believe, 20,000 acres. A great military reservation was established at Aberdeen. After the establishment of a proving ground there the Government took over the property which is now known as the gas-experiment station at Edgewood, practically joining Aberdeen, a property embracing about 5,000 acres. In addition to that, we have had for a long time the Indianhead Proving Ground. So we have available for use the proving ground in New Jersey, with a range of 14 miles; the proving ground embracing 20,000 acres at Aberdeen; the proving ground in connection with the gas plant at Edgewood, embracing 5,000 acres; and the proving ground at Indianhead—four distinct proving grounds where before the war we only had, so far as I know, one proving ground available for the use of the Government. During the emergency of the war the Navy secured an additional proving ground at Dahlgren for testing long-range guns, so that gives us five proving grounds.

I ask the Senate how we can expect to reduce governmental expenses unless we cut down some of the work which is being carried on by the War Department and the Navy Department; a work which was originally in the nature of emergency work? The trouble with our Government to-day is that we are carrying on a great number of war activities simply because, under our bureaucratic system, when a certain activity begins it is almost impossible to discontinue it. The testimony shows that there is not the slightest reason in the world for the maintenance of a proving ground at Dahlgren.

The testimony is also very clear—and I think I have some personal knowledge of the situation, having been on the Aberdeen Proving Ground and very recently upon the Edgewood Proving Ground—that the Government can secure either at Aberdeen or Edgewood a range of 25 miles down the Chesapeake Bay, a range equally as long as that which may be obtained at Dahlgren.

In the cross-examination of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance he practically admitted that the guns which are to be tested at Dahlgren could as well be tested at Aberdeen or even at Edgewood. I have the testimony upon that point and I will insert in the RECORD a very brief extract from the testimony of Admiral Earle before the Appropriations Committee, and also a brief extract from the testimony of Admiral McVay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Maryland will be inserted in the RECORD.

The excerpts are as follows:

[From testimony of Admiral Earle.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any reason why you could not and should not have a sufficient number of them tested at the Army proving grounds in order to test the effect of the explosions of the shells?

Admiral EARLE. We are doing it now, sir. We are getting along with what we absolutely have to have on a land range test at Aberdeen.

The CHAIRMAN. Aberdeen is a very elaborate proving ground?

Admiral EARLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is going to be a proving ground of very great capacity?

Admiral EARLE. Yes, sir.

[From testimony of Admiral McVay.]

Admiral MCVAY. But, in addition to that, this question has been investigated and investigated; in fact, it has taken more of my time than any other one thing since I have been in the bureau, and finally the Bureau of the Budget investigation. Their report was that Dahlgren was necessary, and it was in the interest of efficiency and economy. Personally I know that. I think it is costing us something like four or five hundred thousand dollars less to do all of the work at Dahlgren instead of half at Indianhead and half at Dahlgren. Certainly you would not call that uneconomical.

Senator FRANCE. Personally I think you did suffer for the lack of a long range. But it did seem to me that when we are so interested in reducing expenses, particularly in reducing naval expenditures, in such a way that there would be less prejudice against the Navy, that it might be highly desirable, if possible, to concentrate all of this work at one place. In fact, we have too many plants under the Navy and under the Army, it seems to me, and a consolidation, a concentration, of work would be highly desirable.

Admiral MCVAY. The Navy has no unnecessary plants at the present time. I am not familiar with the War Department.

Senator FRANCE. Of course, we here provide funds for both departments.

Admiral MCVAY. Yes.

Senator FRANCE. And there is only one Treasury, although there are many departments and bureaus. Of course, if it is possible to avoid duplication it is in the interest of economy, and I think this a case where it might be done.

Admiral MCVAY. We can not duplicate anything at Indianhead, because I can spend no more money in facilities at any station. The Treasury is perfectly safe in that regard, because the law is to that effect.

I would be very glad if our Army friends want to test any guns at Indianhead to do as much as we can for them. We work very well together. We are very much interested in each other. There is scarcely any duplication of work. In fact, the two departments having different proving grounds, give us very valuable comparative tests, which are necessary, and we do a great amount of work together. I have, for instance, an officer that attends all the meetings of the Army ordnance technical committee. We have a combined special technical committee that meets twice a month. The Army and naval officers meet in the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy one Tuesday a month, and on another Tuesday a month they meet in Army Ordnance. We have the greatest cooperation. We are always phoning to each other. We are always checking up data—and I think it is a splendid thing.

Mr. FRANCE. The question in connection with this appropriation is clearly a question as to whether or not we are disposed now to cut down war activities and reduce governmental expenses. The reason we are now spending $4,000,000,000 each year is in large part due to the fact that we have not cut off some of the activities which were inaugurated during the period of the war emergency. Every single piece of ordnance which it is proposed to test at Dahlgren may, beyond dispute, be tested at Aberdeen or at Edgewood, Md. I have not mentioned some of the smaller proving grounds like that at Camp Meade, in Maryland, which is suitable for the testing of rifles and short-range guns.

I have no interest in this matter except to secure, in this particular instance, a policy of governmental economy and, of course, incidentally to preserve Indianhead, where a large amount of money has already been expended, which is in every respect a more convenient proving ground than is Dahlgren. The heavy guns may be transported to Aberdeen, to Edgewood, or to Indianhead by rail; but they may only be transported to Dahlgren by water from Indianhead or by water from Washington. There is no railroad whatever at Dahlgren.

Of course, the maintenance of the additional proving ground at Dahlgren means an expense to the Government, which I think is wholly an unnecessary expense. I do not know what the maintenance of Dahlgren will amount to each year, but it will probably be several hundred thousand dollars, which is not an inconsiderable sum, indeed, to be saved.

I have proposed an amendment which seems to me is a very reasonable amendment to the provision inserted by the House. That provision, which the committee propose to strike out, reads:

That no part of this appropriation or any other appropriation contained in this act shall be available for expenditure at the naval proving ground, Dahlgren, Va., except so much as may be necessary to maintain the station on a closed-down basis.

The House inserted that provision after very careful study of this question. I would add to that provision the following proviso, which I think is a very reasonable one:

Provided, That the naval proving ground at Dahlgren may be used for the testing of such long-range guns as can not be tested at any other proving ground owned by the United States Government.

I offer that amendment to the portion proposed to be stricken out, and, as I have said, it seems to me to be a most reasonable proviso. It certainly will result in great economy to the Government.

Mr. President, I might discuss this matter at great length and quote from the testimony taken before the committee and which is in the record, but I shall not detain the Senate, as I know there is a desire on the part of many Senators to take a recess. I do feel, however, that the proviso which I have offered to the portion of the House text proposed to be stricken out should be adopted, and that then the provision as inserted by the House should be allowed to remain as amended by the addition of the proviso.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Maryland deserves commendation for the excellent manner in which he has presented this matter in which his State is interested, although I think not interested in the way in which some of the members of the delegation from that State seem to apprehend. One result of the establishment of the proving grounds at Dahlgren—in fact, the only result—is to transfer the work of proving the big guns of the Navy from Indianhead, Md., to Dahlgren, Va., and I presume it is perfectly natural that the Representatives of the State of Maryland here should resist that change. I wish to say for the Senator from Maryland that he has resisted it in a very able manner, which it is quite difficult to oppose. He appeared before the committee, but, after a very complete examination of the entire question and a very thorough consideration of it, both the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and the full Appropriations Committee disagreed with the Senator from Maryland and recommended the amendment contained in the bill. It was fought out in the House of Representatives by the popular and able champions of Maryland in that body.

Very briefly the proposition involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is to have two proving grounds instead of one. He says that will be in the interest of economy, but the committee is very firmly of the opinion that it would be a very extravagant system to have a proving ground for short-range guns at Indianhead, with one overhead expense and one organization, and another proving ground for long-range guns at Dahlgren, with another overhead and another organization. The fact of the case is it would be the most extravagant system which could be adopted.

The time to have disputed this proposition, if it was going to be disputed at all, was at the time when Dahlgren was acquired. That time has long gone by. We have expended $2,000,000 in acquiring Dahlgren and improving it. We have acquired there some 1,400 acres of land, and there we have a place which is said by every expert who has been examined and which is believed by the members of the subcommittee who took the pains to make a trip to Dahlgren and personally inspect it to be excellently adapted for the actual firing of projectiles from the long-range guns of the Navy at high elevation to a great distance. There is no place at Indianhead at which that may be done. The longest range that can be had at Indianhead is some 14 miles. At Dahlgren there is a range of 25 miles, which is absolutely essential. The only test that could be made by naval guns before Dahlgren was acquired was an artificial test, so to speak, by reducing the charge and reducing the distance and making mathematical computations as to the range of the guns based upon that artificial reduction of the charge and of the range. It was found afterwards that when the guns were fired the actual distance they were out of range from 2,000 to 3,000 yards, which, of course, would put the United States in a ridiculous and perhaps in a fatal position if any such tests were depended upon in time of battle. That shows the importance of having actual tests to determine the actual range.

There is practically no expenditure of money involved, because the money has already been expended at Dahlgren. I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be rejected and that the committee amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, is it necessary that the Government should own all of these proving grounds? Could not some of them be sold?

Mr. POINDEXTER. At Indianhead we have a powder factory, which will be continued there, but, as was stated to the committee, and apparently with good reason, it is not desirable to have the continual firing of heavy guns in the immediate vicinity of a powder factory. So far serious accidents have been avoided, but because of occasional defects in shells pieces of projectiles sometimes fly at all sorts of divergent angles, which might lead to a great disaster there and to the death of many people. That objection lies to Indianhead, in addition to the objection that there is not sufficient range available there.

Edgewood is a gas-warfare establishment. There are no facilities there, even though the gas factory were not there, for the firing of long-range guns. It never has been developed for that purpose, and I do not suppose that it would be desirable to carry on experiments with highly explosive gases and all the work incident to them in connection with the firing of guns.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, have we not abolished gases by treaty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; we have not. It was agreed between certain nations that they would not use gases, but that was not binding upon other nations that were not parties to that treaty, and the Army appropriation bill this year carries an appropriation for gas warfare.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the thing I am interested in particularly—and I confess that I am ignorant and do not know, and that is the reason why I ask the question—is whether we need all of these proving grounds, or whether we could dispose of some of the five or six proving grounds to which the Senator from Maryland made reference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that statement created a rather erroneous impression as to the number of proving grounds. I am not familiar with the Army proving ground in New Jersey, but the Aberdeen Proving Ground is an Army proving ground, and it would not be practicable for the Army and the Navy to carry out their testing of guns at the same place. Furthermore, it has the objection that they fire into the immediate approach to Baltimore Harbor and interfere there with a very extensive commerce. As to keeping the Aberdeen Proving Ground, that is a question rather for the Military Affairs Committee as to whether that should be kept, or whether the gas works at Edgewood should be kept.

As to the naval establishment at Indianhead, considering the savings that the Government has enjoyed in the reduction of the price of powder by making its own powder, and not only in the supply that the Government got but in its effect upon the powder market, I think it is desirable to retain that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say, in connection with what the Senator has said, that they can not even test a 5-inch gun at Indianhead. A 5-inch gun requires about 24,000 yards to test it. They have only twelve or fourteen thousand yards available at Indianhead, and when they have tested the small guns, as the Senator said, they have had to do it by conjecture. That is, they never could put them at an angle of over eight degrees, and consequently it was a mere calculation and guess as to how those guns could be used in case of a battle. At Dahlgren they have a range of 30 miles.

A naval ship is worth nothing unless you can shoot. The whole training, the whole purpose for which you have the ship, is to be able to shoot. There is one thing that you always ought to be certain about in a battle. You always have to guess at the distance the enemy ship is from you. That is a mere conjecture, but you ought to know that your guns will shoot accurately if you know the distance. That is, if the distance is 24 miles your guns ought to have been tested, and your powder and your shells, and you ought to know that your shells will land at 24 miles or 20 miles or 18 miles. That ought never to be guessed. It is criminal for a Government to have its forces guessing on that.

You spend millions and millions and millions of dollars to equip your men to destroy the enemy's ships. When you are entering a battle there are two things you have to do. You have first to guess at the distance, and you have this salvo firing by which you soon get the range. When these guns were tested at Indianhead they had only a 12,000-yard range, or 14,000 in the best days. They could not put them at the angle necessary to shoot the entire distance, and consequently they simply made arbitrary calculations as to how the guns would shoot at a certain distance. When they tested them at Dahlgren they found they were three or four thousand yards out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think I was in error inadvertently in stating that there was a range of 14 miles at Indianhead. I think 14,000 yards is the range there.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all. This is the only proving ground that the Navy has that it selected itself. The people did not want it there very much, because people do not like to be around where there is very much firing, just as at Indianhead we always used to have to be paying damages for shooting over people's land, which we did there, and because of the explosions. This is the only proving ground that the Navy has to give an absolute guaranty to your sailors that your guns have been tested before they have been put on your ships; and if you know the distance, then there is no guess as to where your shells will land. Now, it is proposed to come here for some little purpose and put the entire Navy in jeopardy, to have 86,000 sailors guessing at the accuracy of your guns even when you know the distance, making two elements of uncertainty—first as to the distance of the other fleet, and then guessing and making an arbitrary calculation as to what your guns will do when the distance is known. When they made the real test they found that the calculation for the guns was 3,000 yards out, which would have been fatal in a battle.

There is not a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House or Senate, not a member of the committee that investigated this matter, that was not unanimously of the opinion that this provision ought to go out, and the Dahlgren Proving Ground kept. There is not a man in the Navy Department who does not say that it is absolutely indispensable to an efficient and splendid administration of the Navy in connection with the accuracy of its shooting.

It does seem to me that with that situation, with everybody that investigated it practically unanimous, we can not afford to destroy and close up this proving ground. We are testing guns there now every day. This amendment does not save any money. It simply prohibits them from doing any testing there. It does not reduce the appropriation. It simply says that you can not test guns there, when they are being tested now every day at Dahlgren. Aberdeen is busy most of the time in testing. These guns must be tested. The whole secret of a naval battle is to have the accuracy of your guns fixed when you know the distance, and that can only be done by actual experience.

As to Aberdeen, the admiral did testify that they could test shells there, as they did for years down at Indianhead—that is, to test the shell as to whether it explodes properly—but there is a big difference between testing shells and testing guns. All the shells that are bought and made are tested to see whether they are sound, whether they are good, whether they explode at the proper time, and so forth; but when you test a gun that is done to know whether the shell will be landed with a certain angle at a certain distance when you fix the distance from the ship with accuracy. You will see that all that Admiral Earle said was that the shells could be tested there. He never said the guns could be tested there.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator, if that is so, where are we going to test the big guns for our Coast Artillery, which are exactly of the same character as our largest naval guns?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know to what extent we do testing for the Coast Artillery. All I know is that your guns are fixed to go on ships. They need this place down here on the river, and the Navy Department says it would absolutely paralyze the entire ordnance department of the Navy to close up Dahlgren.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether this particular proving ground should be maintained or not, but I am satisfied that the Government is wasting a great deal of money in considering the Navy and the Army as entirely distinct and separate entities at all times and for all purposes. Whether proving grounds should be at Aberdeen or somewhere else, I am satisfied that there ought to be one ground to serve both the Army and the Navy. In the Coast Artillery, by reason of the Limitation of Armament Conference, we are taking some of the new guns off of the vessels, or taking those that were built for the new vessels, and we are going to use them for our fixed batteries in the Coast Artillery. What possible reason or sense can there be in having two overhead organizations, costing large amounts of money, for the purpose of a proving ground where one ought to serve both departments of the Government?

What is true of proving grounds is true of a great many other things. If we are going to economize in Government expenditures, we shall have to pay less attention to the demand of both the Army and the Navy that in all matters they must be considered as absolutely distinct and separate entities.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me for a moment, I wish to send to the desk and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a list of the naval stations, so called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, there is no cure for the waste to which the Senators from Maryland and Wisconsin have referred by a trivial amendment on the floor. There are a hundred establishments of the United States Navy, or thereabouts, in the continental United States. There was a time, of course, when company posts were maintained throughout the western country long after there were any Indians not on the reservations. We know very well that it is not the Navy alone, but Congress no less, which has contributed to the establishment of this multitude of unnecessary stations. The only cure lies in a thoroughgoing examination, either by a joint committee of Congress or by a commission appointed by the President under act of Congress, to determine which of these stations shall be continued and which shall be abolished. If there be a hundred, who doubts but that a third of them may be abolished and the land upon which they are built sold?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I just want to call attention to the fact that the question involved here is not whether or not an additional station shall be acquired. It is just a question of where the activity shall be carried on—where the guns shall be tested. It will cost practically as much in one place as in another. In fact, it will cost much less, so far as the Navy is concerned, to have it all in one place rather than in two places, as is proposed by the pending amendment.

I hope the pending amendment will be rejected.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I wish the debate to make it perfectly clear that the testimony is absolutely beyond dispute to the effect that every gun that is tested at Dahlgren can be tested at Aberdeen. There is not the slightest question of that.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. It is a question of maintaining an additional proving ground—of maintaining four proving grounds where before the war we had but one.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, does not the Senator think it is right to investigate Aberdeen and Dahlgren to see which it is in the interest of the Government to close? Before we close up one in Virginia or one in Maryland, had not an investigation better be had?

Mr. FRANCE. So far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator from Virginia that in the interest of economy I would not at all urge the maintenance of Aberdeen as against Dahlgren.

Mr. SWANSON. Why did not the Senator offer an amendment to that effect, then?

Mr. FRANCE. I think it would be advisable perhaps even to close down Aberdeen. I do know that until we do away with some of these war activities we will continue to have a four or five billion dollar Government, and I do maintain that every gun that is tested at Dahlgren can be tested at Aberdeen. If I had a map here I could show the ranges as laid down by Admiral McVay himself. At Aberdeen you shoot down the bay; at Dahlgren you shoot across the bay. In either instance it is necessary to fire across a channel. The argument was made that the Aberdeen range crosses a channel, but the same argument can be made with reference to Dahlgren because, of course, the Dahlgren range crosses a channel, and it is impossible to fire anywhere in the Chesapeake Bay a gun with a range of 25 miles without crossing a channel.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Maryland must remember surely that Admiral McVay very explicitly testified that the firing from the proving ground at Aberdeen gravely threatened commerce, whereas the firing from the proving ground at Dahlgren did nothing of the sort. Sometimes it might interfere with a few fishing boats, but those were always put upon notice; and the Senator surely will recall that Admiral McVay was unqualified in his assertion that the retention of the proving ground at Dahlgren is essential to the successful proving of the naval guns.

Mr. FRANCE. But the point to be remembered is that the admiral maintained that the Navy has no unnecessary proving ground. Let me read from the testimony. I will say, in prefacing my reading from the testimony, that I would be the last man in the Senate to advocate the abolishment of a long-range proving ground. I would be in favor of continuing Dahlgren if we did not have two other proving grounds, if not three, in Maryland. I will eliminate Indianhead as being unsuitable.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to the Senator that it would be better to leave the determination of that matter to the experts of the Navy Department rather than to a Senator from Maryland or a Senator from Virginia?

Mr. FRANCE. As a matter of fact, I am old fashioned enough to believe that some responsibility rests upon the legislative branch of the Government, and that we who levy the taxes are also somewhat responsible for the expenditures, and if we leave this question of expenditures to all of the bureaus which we built up during the war and all of the divisions which we built up during the war, we shall continue to have a four or five billion dollar Government.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator suggest that the subcommittee of the general Committee on Appropriations had no regard for the question of economy in considering this question?

Mr. FRANCE. I am not at all reflecting upon the committee, but I will say that I was perhaps present at the last meeting of the committee on this very question, and at that committee meeting the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance said that he was charged with responsibility for the proving of these guns, and that, as the responsibility was upon him, he felt that his opinion should be given due weight. It was the result, in my judgment, of that statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance that the committee acted, even in spite of the clear testimony that we had a long range at Aberdeen, and also one, as I have stated, at Edgewood.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator will recall that in that identical statement Admiral McVay assured the subcommittee that there was no question of additional expenditure involved; that there would be no economy in the abandonment of this $2,500,000 plant.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there is a question I want to ask. Has the Senator anything to submit to the Senate showing what additional appropriations would be saved by the adoption of the House provision?

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will examine the testimony of Admiral McVay last given before the committee, he will there see it specifically stated that there is no economy involved in the abandonment of the plant at Dahlgren.

Mr. FRANCE. There is a certain amount of overhead expense in the carrying of every additional plant. When you close down a plant, you get rid of that inevitable overhead. Unless Aberdeen is abandoned that overhead expense goes right on at Aberdeen, and the cost of testing at Aberdeen would undoubtedly be much less than the cost of testing at Dahlgren. The transportation of heavy ordnance to Dahlgren in itself is an expense. These heavy guns must be shipped to Indianhead and then must be transported 35 miles in barges, there being no railroad whatever to Dahlgren, whereas at Aberdeen there is a railroad. Indeed, there is a branch railroad from the main line of the Pennsylvania road, and from the main line, I believe also, of the B. & O., right to the point where the heavy ordnance is tested, and they have tested at Aberdeen the heaviest kind of ordnance, the coast artillery ordnance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to correct the statement of the Senator from Maryland. In regard to the ordnance manufactured in the navy yard in Washington City, it is simply put on barges at the navy yard and transported directly to Dahlgren.

Mr. FRANCE. That is, of course, possible; but it is, to be sure, an expense, because it means an additional handling of the guns. But that is not my point. My point is that every single plant maintained by the Government carries a certain amount of overhead, and you will not reduce the governmental expenditures until you cut down the number of plants. I have the utmost confidence in the Secretary of War and the utmost confidence in the Secretary of the Navy, and therefore I have been waiting for them to find an opportunity to study this very question, knowing that after they had an opportunity to investigate this large question of the number of war activities which are still being carried on, they would come in with recommendations for the cutting out of these war activities. But this activity at Dahlgren is a war activity which can be done away with without the slightest injury to the testing of heavy ordnance.

Speaking on this very point, Admiral McVay said:

The Navy has no unnecessary plants at the present time. I am not familiar with the War Department.

The testimony was very clear that the War Department did have a proving ground upon which these guns could be tested. I said:

Of course, we here provide funds for both departments.
Admiral McVAY. Yes.
Senator FRANCE. And there is only one Treasury, although there are many departments and bureaus.

It seems to me inconceivable that, with the amount of testing of heavy guns we shall have in the next four or five years, the Navy and the Army could not use one single proving ground. It shows a lack of coordination in our governmental activities which, it seems to me, is inexcusable.

Personally, I think a number of these activities could be cut out. I have told the Senate that we have five ranges of 14 miles and greater available now by the Government, including Dahlgren, and when Dahlgren is closed we will have four ranges, in addition to the open ocean ranges, 14 miles in length or more, and two ranges besides Dahlgren of 25 miles. I, myself, have visited recently the proving ground at Edgewood, where they are supposed to be engaged only in the manufacture of gases, and I have found that even at Edgewood they have built concrete foundations for the heavy ordnance that is to be tested there; why, I do not know. We all know that if you start an activity, it is almost impossible to stop it.

I do believe that in the interest of economy my amendment to this proviso should be adopted. It takes care of the contention of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, because it provides that guns may be tested at Dahlgren which can not be tested in any other proving ground.

Certainly, that seems to me to be a reasonable proviso to the provision inserted in the House, and the provision inserted in the House was inserted in the interest of economy. I add to that the proviso inserted by the House, to the effect that Dahlgren can be maintained in a closed-down condition; that it may be used for the testing of heavy ordnance that can not be tested elsewhere; and I feel sure that several hundred thousands dollars of overhead expenses could be saved if Dahlgren were closed.

I am sorry $2,000,000 were spent there. That $2,000,000 spent at Dahlgren never should have been spent, in consideration of the fact that we had those great proving grounds in Maryland, embracing, as I said a few moments ago, 25,000 acres. Some of that land has scarcely been walked over by governmental officials. They hardly know what is there. In Maryland we consider 25,000 acres quite a substantial piece of land. The 20,000-acre proving ground has a water range down the bay of 25 miles, and the 5,000-acre proving ground has practically a simlar range.

I hope I have explained the matter sufficiently to the Senate. I have no interest in it except a desire to conserve the funds of the Government and, of course, incidentally, to prevent the abandonment of Indianhead; but of course that would not mean any serious loss to my State. I am presenting the matter in the interest of economy.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I merely wish to read into the RECORD this statement of Admiral McVay before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. He said:

This question has been investigated and investigated; in fact, it has taken more of my time than any other one thing since I have been in the bureau, and finally the Bureau of the Budget investigation. Their report was that Dahlgren was necessary, and it was in the interest of efficiency and economy. Personally, I know that. I think it is costing us something like four or five hundred thousand dollars less to do all of the work at Dahlgren, instead of half at Indianhead and half at Dahlgren.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

JOHN PAUL DE BAAT DOELMAN (S. DOC. NO. 211).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to permit Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands, to receive instructions at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis at the expense of the Government of the Netherlands.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded by the Government of the Netherlands as an act of courtesy, and that it would be in accordance with established precedents.

WARREN G. HARDING.

The WHITE HOUSE, June 16, 1922.

RECESS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow, the recess being under the order, until 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 7 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, June 17, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, whose life is always spent that we may have life, dwell in us in the spirit of sacrifice. May the sweet summer of divine love rest upon us all. When justice and rectitude must be vindicated, may the duty be seasoned with mercy. Crown our Nation's life with wise intelligence, with reverence for constituted authority, with humble recognition of the Christian's God, with mercy toward the poor and weak, and with the spirit of charity for all. Grant that all our homes may abide in the light and joy of the blessings of the world's Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 26.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a commission is hereby created, consisting of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker, to investigate the needs of the office of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, and to report not later than December 20, 1922, (1) what quarters, equipment, and facilities are necessary properly to care for and protect all records and papers in such office, and (2) what additional personnel, if any, is required to perform the duties imposed by law upon such office.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment No. 186 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June, 1923, and for other purposes, and had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 78, 79, 86, 101, 115, 116, 142, 155, 163, and 187 to said bill.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings of yesterday under which House bill 10101 was sent to conference be rescinded, for this reason: When the House granted permission to send the bill to conference and disagreed to the Senate amendment No. 1 it was with the understanding that that was the only amendment that was pending to go to conference. But the papers that were on the Speaker's desk indicated a different condition existing. It indicated that amendments 78, 79, 86, 101, 115, 116, 142, 155, 163, and 187 were still in disagreement. The fact is that on May 5 last the Senate agreed to the position of the House on these amendments, so that there was nothing left to go into conference but Senate amendment No. 1. The Senate now messages the correct situation over here, making necessary the rescinding of the action taken yesterday by the House, and if the House should rescind yesterday's action I shall ask unanimous consent to take the message off the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to rescind the action of yesterday by which the District of Columbia bill was sent to conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and myself guessed aright yesterday.

Mr. MADDEN. There was only one amendment in dispute, but the records of the Senate as sent here from the Senate did not show it.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, the record of the Senate was in error?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are so busy with so much legislation that they fail to keep their conference records up to date. They are nearly a month behind.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It occurred to me that it would be well to send the bill back to the Senate. I did not object.

Mr. MADDEN. I appreciate the position the gentleman took yesterday, and I recognized his wisdom in that case as I do in all other cases with which he has connection.

Mr. GARNER. Is this one more evidence of "the degeneracy of Congress" to which so much reference has been made?

Mr. MADDEN. We are not allowed to criticize the other body.

Mr. GARNER. I did not say the other body. I said "Congress."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to Senate amendments to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CRAMTON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

DETAIL OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 344, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House Joint Resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344).

To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923 for and in connection with the enforcement of the laws relating to customs not to exceed at any one time four persons detailed from the field force of the Customs Service.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa as to whether he intends to take up the entire day with the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. I have understood that there was practically no objection to the resolution, and that we dispose of it in the hour.

Mr. GARNER. It seems to me that the gentleman ought to make the customary request that the debate be limited to an hour, one-half the time to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman from Iowa calling up that resolution as a privileged matter?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I call it up as a privileged matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I do not think there will be any objection if he will ask unanimous consent to consider it. I doubt very much whether it is privileged. I do not believe that on a thing as immaterial as this, relatively speaking, the question of privilege should be invoked.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would just as lief put it the other way. I do not want to take up the time discussing the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 344. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to insist on it, but I do insist that this side of the House is entitled to consideration in the matter of general debate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I overlooked that for a moment. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be confined to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and one-half to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and one-half to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this debate to be limited to the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish it could be, but I am afraid that it can not be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923, for and in connection with the enforcement of the laws relating to customs not to exceed at any one time four persons detailed from the field force of the Customs Service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while this joint resolution is quite important to the enforcement of the customs regulations, it involves no appropriation and no additional expense. As the Members have observed, the resolution is short, and it simply provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923, for and in connection with the enforcement of the laws relating to customs, not to exceed at any one time four persons detailed from the field force of the Customs Service.

These four persons or other parties in a similar capacity have been in the employ of the Treasury Department so far back that it is beyond my recollection. They have been used by the Treasury to assist in collecting customs. This provision is in the new tariff bill, in section 625, with the exception that it is authorized thereby to use eight persons instead of four. These four persons detailed from the Customs Service are experts. One is an expert in relation to classification and others are experts with reference to other matters pertaining to the Customs Service. So far as I know there is no objection to the resolution, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman wish me to use some of my time?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I would be glad if the gentleman would do that.

Mr. GARNER. How much time did the gentleman from Iowa use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa used three minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa told you briefly what the object of this resolution is. It is to correct a mistake made by the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives. The Committee on Appropriations claim they made the mistake at the suggestion of the Treasury Department. Now, whether the inefficiency exists in the Treasury Department or in the Committee on Appropriations I do not know. It merely illustrates the situation that we hear exists in this administration at the present time. We are told by the highest authority that the Congress is inefficient, that it has reached its lowest ebb in the history of the country, and I think we had just as well admit now that that is an actual fact. We have a resolution coming from the other end of the Capitol this morning indicating that the other body do not even know how to report a transaction in that body touching an amendment to an appropriation bill. We have one of the most eminent men connected with the administration indicating the intellect of the Congress, and for the sake of argument only I am going to admit that the indictment is true. Everybody knew that the Congress would come to its lowest ebb whenever the Republican majority in the House or the Senate was the largest. [Laughter and applause.] At the present time you have got the largest majority in the history of the country, so it is at its very lowest ebb. But we are going to correct that in March, 1923, when we are going to improve it a little bit.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Just a little.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, it is really amusing to hear some Cabinet officer discuss the ability and the standing of the Congress of the United States. Peculiarly is it offensive—I think I may use that word with the approval of a good percentage of the membership of this House—peculiarly is it offensive for the Cabinet minister who is now at the head of the War Department to chastise Congress. He served in this body and served in the other body at the other end of the Capitol; and I imagine that if it had not been for a man by the name of DAVID I. WALSH, the Secretary of War would still have a pretty good opinion of the American Congress. [Applause.] But Mr. Walsh gave him a very low opinion, first, of the American people, and, second, of the American Congress; because the American Congress has persistently refused to heed his suggestions as to what legislation should be enacted since he has been a Cabinet minister. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and I thought especially probably the Speaker himself would take the floor this morning for the purpose of repudiating the speech made by Secretary Weeks. Of course, Secretary Weeks is better acquainted with the Massachusetts delegation than with any other delegation in the House of Representatives or in the Senate.

The delegation from Massachusetts presides over the House of Representatives. The delegation from Massachusetts presides over the Senate. The leader of the Senate, Mr. LODGE, with whom Mr. Weeks is very well acquainted, is from Massachusetts. Here in the House the Assistant Speaker is from Massachusetts. I presume Secretary Weeks is familiar with all these gentlemen, and he must have drawn his conclusions from his estimate of the people who represent his own State. [Laughter.] Besides, we have an eminent gentleman from Massachusetts who is chairman of one of the largest committees in the House, Mr. WINSLOW. I am sure that Secretary Weeks is perfectly familiar with his ability. So after he sums up Massachusetts in the Congress, the leadership in the Senate, the Presiding Officer in the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the Assistant Speaker of the House, and the chairman of a leading committee in the House, all from Massachusetts, he comes to the conclusion that the Congress has reached its lowest ebb in the history of the Government. [Laughter.] Ah, what a nice arrangement, and how harmonious it must be among the Republicans!

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman ought to suggest that the chairman of the committee reporting the most important bill in this session of Congress, the ship subsidy bill, is also from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARNER. I have no intention of slighting Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Of course, Secretary Weeks is well acquainted with Mr. GREENE, who has been in Congress twenty-odd years and who is senior to Mr. Weeks himself.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And the chairman of one of the elections committees.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; Massachusetts holds a predominant place, and I am sure Mr. Weeks was looking at the Congress through the glasses of the Massachusetts delegation in both the House and Senate when he formed his estimate, especially through the glasses of DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I think that is the main cause of this tirade.

But I want to congratulate the Republican organization, not only in the House and Senate but the country, on the glorious spectacle of Massachusetts assaulting the Congress on the rostrum and the Congress assaulting Pennsylvania by petition. It is said that 150 Members of the House have petitioned the President of the United States virtually to put out of office Andy Mellon, and Secretary Weeks virtually asking the American people to turn you out in order that he may raise the grade of Congress by putting the membership over on the Democratic side. [Laughter.] Fine team work! It must make you proud of your Cabinet and of your organization. I do not blame Will Hays for going to the movies or anywhere else. [Laughter.] A nice kettle of fish! You can not get the offices fast enough, so 150 of you have signed a petition to Andy.

No, I do not know, but this morning when I saw that statement I said to myself, "Whose goat will they get first? Will it be John Weeks or Andy Mellon?" And I am going to bet my money that Andy lasts the longest. Andy has got the money bags, and you know you folks have got to stand with them. [Laughter.] So I am going to bet my money on Andy. It is a delightful thing from the Democratic standpoint to note this harmony existing throughout the Republican organization. It is delightful to know that in the House of Representatives there has been no swearing on your side that you have followed the leadership of the gentleman from Wyoming except on certain occasions—and those occasions have been numerous, and they are going to be more numerous in the future when the ship subsidy bill comes up. But the harmony existing in the Senate is likewise delightful from the Democratic viewpoint, but is not very good from the country's standpoint.

I agree with Mr. Weeks in one thing, that this ought to be a party government. But, Mr. Chairman, that party government ought to originate in the House of Representatives and not be dictated to from the other end of the Avenue by the Secretary of War or any other Secretary. [Applause.] I believe in party government, and your party would be better off to-day if it had heeded the advice of your men who have been here these many years and who have got to go back every two years for a new certificate; if the administration had heeded your advice and let you do the organizing, let you do the legislating, your party would be better off and the country might have been better off as well.

No, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to criticize the Republican Party except as the Republican Party deserves criticism. Your party has deserved criticism in this House and deserves criticism particularly about one thing, and that is you have not had the courage to carry out your own judgment. That is what I criticize you for. If you just had the courage to do according to your own judgment, the country would be better off. We would have better legislation, we would have more efficient service in the country if you were permitted to exercise your own patriotism and your own good judgment. We want to give you that much certificate of character. [Laughter.] But you have no courage. You are going to do as you are told. There are not 120 of you who want to consider the ship subsidy bill, but they are going to make you take it; they are going to make you swallow it, and you do not want it. [Applause.] The Speaker of the House of Representatives does not want it; it is against his judgment. The gentleman from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, does not want it; the steering committee, or a majority, does not want it, but you are going to take it. Why? He has told you—and that is what I blame Mr. Harding for—that if you do not come across with a ship subsidy bill you can not get a certificate of character next November, and you all want that certificate of character. [Laughter.] What I object to Mr. Harding for is that one morning he tells the people of the United States that he does not desire to boss Congress, that he is not to interfere with them; he is a constitutional President; and the next morning I see in the very same press—the Washington Post—that Mr. Harding is going to whip them into line; that it will be disastrous to the party if they fail to carry out his program. You are to keep the tariff bill in the Senate until he can force you to pass the ship subsidy bill, and then push the ship subsidy bill right behind the tariff in the Senate so that you get no chance for the bonus or any other legislation.

That is the program, and the country might as well know it. Are you going to stand for it? I did not vote for the bonus, but you did. Three hundred of you in this House voted for it. Are you going to permit the program to be carried through? Are you going to permit it, Mr. MONDELL? Of course, you would not if you could help yourself, but you are in a precarious condition. It will not hurt anything to say that you have been handicapped a little in your leadership on account of the fact that you have been trying to degenerate yourself into another body. [Laughter and applause.] You are to be pitied in some particulars on account of that very great handicap. I do want to appeal to the gentleman to assert himself as a leader once for all, he and the Speaker, and make the House of Representatives what you and I know it ought to be, what it can be made to be if you will just give somebody in the chair and somebody on the floor of the House the backbone to run this business and say what you are going to do. They will weaken; you have never tried it. Try it once and see how the country will take it. I think you will find that it will do you good. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of War has broken loose again. [Laughter.] At Cleveland, Ohio, on June 15, the illustrious Secretary of War permitted an acquired habit of his—that of turning his mouth loose and going off and leaving it—to recur. He is quoted by the Associated Press as saying in his speech that he was tempted to call it "The Decline of the American Government." A careful reading of the speech, however, by anyone acquainted with the Secretary's history would suggest the query, "Why this?" He says that "the legislative branch of our National Government probably never has been at a lower ebb than it is to-day." He accounts for this by the direct charge that the people are having too much to do with the lawmaking of the country now. He subdivides this charge by the claim that the Representatives in Congress should not be nominated by the people at the primaries, and that after they are nominated and elected they should pay no attention to the people that did elect them.

The legislation that seems to be worrying him that has been enacted by this Congress is the legislation in the interests of agriculture and national prohibition. Who is the gentleman that he should pass judgment on the men selected by the people to make their laws? He was a Senator from Massachusetts; his term expired on March 4, 1919; he was a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency of the United States in 1916. He thought that the nomination for President could be procured in a certain way by certain organizations; but the people had too much to do with selecting the delegates to that convention for him to have a look-in. Then he was renominated in Massachusetts by his party for reelection as Senator in 1918, but, due to what he terms a "gradually degenerating Congress," the Congress of the United States and the people had decided that the United States Senators must be elected by direct vote, and though 1918 was a Republican year, he was about the only man I know of that was on that ticket that succeeded in being defeated.

No wonder that the genial gentleman should lose confidence in the American people to govern themselves. But were the people entirely wrong in this instance? Of course, it was a catastrophe to have the grand old Bay State of Massachusetts turn down a Republican for a Democrat, and it went out to the country that Massachusetts had made a great mistake. And in 1920 we repeated the Republican victory of 1918; and the President of the United States, one of the best men in the world, being of a sympathetic nature, desirous of helping all those with whom he was acquainted, concluded, apparently, to try to make a man out of the ex-Senator [laughter], and gave him a great appointment, for which he should be grateful to the President and to the Republican Party, as it afforded him an opportunity to "come back."

The first time Congress had a chance to consult with him he protested against our reducing the size of the Army from 235,000 to 150,000. We had been elected, not appointed, and, as the Secretary of War says in this same speech at Cleveland, we were elected on a "platform that promised to reduce taxation"; but the Secretary of War took the position with the Congress and the President that we could not reduce the Army without incurring a great moral obligation, and prevailed upon the President to write us a letter. However, Congress, fresh from the voters, persisted, the Army was reduced, and none of the complications predicted by the War Department arose; the men asked for their discharges, and were glad to get back to civil life.

In the Cleveland speech the Secretary says:

> In its platform of 1920 the dominant party promised to reduce taxation. In some respects it has failed to do so, not because a large number of the Republican Senators and Representatives do not wish to carry out the pledges of their party but because of the combination of a part of the majority devoted to a special interest with the minority in Congress and an insistence on their part that income taxes, generally speaking, should not be reduced.

I charge here that the Secretary of War has been the most persistent of anyone that I know of in trying to get unnecessary appropriations out of Congress. I charge, too, that he is the only man in the Republican Party or in the country but what will admit that we have reduced taxation and reduced the expenditures of this Government, and that the administration has been successful in doing so. [Applause.] I further wish to call attention to the fact that the Secretary, after coming here and fighting for additional appropriations for his department—asking, say, for fifty to one hundred million dollars more than we gave him, then saving a little money—and I do not charge him with not being willing to economically administer, but when he does save a little part of an appropriation he gives out publicly, and it is heralded to the country, that the Secretary of War is saving money in spite of Congress, and there is not a Representative but what knows that this unfairness has been indulged in by the Secretary.

I am sure that every Member of Congress, regardless of party, agrees that the Secretary's speech and advice to these young men that were being graduated from school was as untimely, if not wholly unsound, as could be contemplated. He even becomes so desperate in trying to prove to those young men that they, if they ever get into public life, should pay no attention to the wishes, ambitions, and desires of the people whom they represent that he quotes from some book that ex-President Wilson had written to prove that the people themselves can not make the laws. I have no fault to find with the book, and the book does say, "It must have a lawmaking body; it can no more make law through its voters than it can make law through its newspapers." No one disputes that; but it does not follow that the voters have no rights in as to what the laws shall be, that they shall be ignored by the lawmakers. I think I have the best constituency in the world; if I knew of a better class of people to live among, of course I would try to live there, and I am frank to say to this Congress that no man in my district has ever attempted to work out the details of the laws that he wanted the Congress to pass; they do suggest the principles that they want enacted into law; they have a right to suggest them; and whenever I conclude to follow Secretary Weeks or any other man who is surrounded by an artificial atmosphere and cease to represent them, then they would have a right to and they should select a Congressman that would represent them and not some one else.

Why did the Secretary attack prohibition? He said he was speaking individually and not as a member of the Cabinet, but so long as he is a member of the Cabinet he ought to speak as a member of the Cabinet. Eighty-five per cent of the people of the United States are in favor of prohibition; but think of the Secretary of War making a speech to students in the home State of the President of the United States and criticizing prohibition. The President voted for prohibition and advocates it in his public utterances, but here is a man whom the President has taken up after he has been repudiated by his people, whom the President in the kindness of his heart is trying to make a man of, goes out to Ohio, talking to students of a school, and cites prohibition as an instance to prove that if those graduates ever get into public life and occupy positions of trust they should follow not the wishes of the people that they represent but they should "carefully avoid supporting a proposition because it is popular to do so."

Personally I am scarcely acquainted with Secretary Weeks; I have no personal grudge against him; his former colleagues in this House speak kindly of him; and I am frank to say that it is the common expression here that they do not understand his attitude as a Cabinet officer. In this speech he says, "There is almost a universal condemnation of Congress at this time. While I think there are reasons why Congress may be criticized, I am sure that much of the criticism laid at its door is unjustified." Then he, the brave, undaunted Secretary of War, not afraid of public opinion, advising the pupils never to yield for the purpose of public applause, joins the anvil chorus and becomes the unfairest of them all.

I think he is mistaken; the votes so far this year do not show that Congress has been condemned. Members of Congress are not going to ask for reelection with an apology for the laws we have passed, but, as was clearly demonstrated by Doctor FESS, an ardent supporter of national prohibition, a candidate for the United States Senate from the State of Ohio, in which this speech was made, Members of Congress that seek reelection will do so upon their records without any apologies. [Applause.]

The Secretary says that "There is a universal demand that the President take control and lead in legislative matters." That was a nice thing for a member of the Cabinet to say, after the President and the Republican Party had made a campaign on the theory and with the argument that we should have three separate and distinct branches of the Government. No more ardent advocate of that form of government than the President of the United States, but he was out in Ohio; Doctor FESS, an ardent supporter of prohibition, was running for United States Senator; prohibition passed by a Republican Congress over the veto of the then Democratic President, and an appointee of the Republican President, who helped to pass it over that veto, criticizing, finding fault with the law.

Some people think it is a sin to be in politics and have political sense and judgment; if that is a sin, Secretary Weeks will never be punished for being guilty of that sin. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that there should be any bad feeling toward Secretary Weeks. He is merely doing what we are all prone to do, he is confessing the sins of the other fellow. He is confessing your sins, which you all admit ought to be confessed by somebody. He is just omitting to confess the sins of the executive department. But in this morning's Herald I find these headlines:

G. O. P. leaders turn guns on primary law. Weeks's attack seen as move to better Congress personnel.

He need not bother about that; we will better it in November. [Laughter.] He can save himself all of that reform agony.

What does this article by Robert J. Bender say?

There is an apparently concerted movement on among high administration officials, first, to effect a modification or repeal of the direct primary law, and, second, to better the personnel of Congress.

That is a rather ambitious program. I might suggest that the primary laws are enacted by the States, and while there has been scant courtesy shown to the rights of the States, as my friend from Delaware, Doctor LAYTON, will admit, I do not think we are yet come to the position where the administration or the executive branch of the Government can require this Congress to repeal the direct primary laws of the States. So far as the second proposition is concerned, to better the personnel of Congress, as I have already suggested, we will cooperate on the Democratic side of the House with the distinguished administration and better the personnel of Congress with a great deal of success, probably, in November. Reading further from the article:

In connection with this movement there has developed a chorus of warnings from highly placed officials against the so-called "Red menace" in this country, against the placing of too much power in the hands of the people themselves, and expressions of concern lest propaganda and the cry of "demagogues" translate that power into a social democracy for the United States.

Let us see just how that sounds, coming from the administration of the great party that claims as its patron saint Abraham Lincoln, who said to trust the people and the people alone, and to take your inspiration from them and to follow them. So they are going to take this power away from the people. That was Secretary Weeks's statement, the opening gun in that campaign. I am not surprised. I find that Secretary Weeks says that the direct primary, the bloc agitation, the country's readiness to accept constitutional amendments are destructive of our Government. He says:

The direct primary has so palpably lessened the quality of men willing to serve in public affairs that prompt action should be taken to greatly modify or entirely repeal it.

He is also quoted as saying that the legislative branch of our National Government probably never had been at a lower ebb than it is now.

That last I take from the Washington Post of this morning. I admit that last allegation; we will all admit it, I think, because it has the greatest percentage of Republican Members that has ever sat in any Congress of the United States, and the efficiency of Congress always varies in the inverse ratio to the number of Republican Members. Why this distrust of the people, why this movement which he announced yesterday, which he invoked and advocated? As has already been said by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], Secretary Weeks has tried the people, and he did not fare well in a Republican State because he was supplanted by a Democratic Senator, and I hope the same trick will be turned again next November in the same State. And Mr. Hughes, another distinguished member of the Cabinet, also tried it on the people, and the people did not elect him President of the United States. I do not remember how many more of these distinguished gentlemen have bit the dust when they went to the people, but Mr. Daugherty cast his hat in the ring some years ago and it was battered beyond recognition by the people. And Mr. Denby was beaten for Congress by one NEWBERRY and a bank roll.

Mr. Hoover has never been elected to anything. He has never been able to even carry his own State in a primary election for nomination to a Republican office. No wonder they want to get away from the people and write under the Republican banner the words, "We are an oligarchy, the people be hanged," or words to that effect. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see some smiling faces on the Democratic side this morning. For a long time that side of the House has been a perfect cave of gloom. The few scattered remnants that were left after the last election could hardly, even under the influence of the genial gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], get up a smile. This morning, however, they seem to feel better. The gentleman from Texas, the champion jollier of the House, has in some way planted some encouragement in their minds; but, gentlemen, after all, what have you to be encouraged about? Have you found anything in the elections to encourage you? Nothing. Have you found anything in the primary vote to encourage you? The primary vote everywhere showed a great falling off in the contested States on the part of the Democratic Party and a great increase on the part of the Republicans. Does it look favorable to you gentlemen simply because the gentleman from Texas rises in his seat and wants to plant the seeds of discord on this side? The gentleman from Texas, in addition to being a past master as a jollier, is also a past master in suggesting ways in which we might find trouble on this side, but permit me to say to my friend that we will look after those matters ourselves; that we will not seek counsel on his side; and one of the last things we will do will be to follow his advice.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Iowa indorse the statement of Secretary Weeks in his position concerning the Congress?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not responsible for the actions of any Cabinet officer. Let me say to my friend that he himself both attacked and defended the act of Congress. He was woefully weak in his attack, but he was fine in his defense. I ask him to stand by what he said in reference to the judgment and the action of this side of the House. We could go to the country on that statement, but we prefer to stand on our record, which will be approved by the country at large.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman that if he can find anybody on the Republican side of the House who will defend Secretary Weeks, I would be very glad to yield a little time to him. I think the man ought to have defenders. I believe each side ought to be heard, and if the gentleman is not willing to defend Secretary Weeks I want to say to that part of the House that in case the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee will not defend him, in case the leader from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will not defend him, I shall yield to somebody else time in order that this man may have his day in court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but again I suggest to my friend from Texas that we will follow our own leadership on this side and not the leadership on his side. We do not care for any suggestions from the gentleman's side of the aisle and we will not accept them when they are made.

Mr. GARNER. I understood the leadership had been transferred to the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman probably comes to that conclusion because it was the case under the preceding administration. I sat here for eight years when every time down at the other end of the Avenue there was a crook of a finger every man here on the Democratic side jumped. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that when important legislation was sent up from the departments in the Sixty-fifth Congress, which was a Democratic Congress, a man would sit up in the gallery with a whip in his hand and drop down notes suggesting amendments or giving orders?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It was so understood, although really it was not necessary, because the orders were so plain and precise from the other end of the Avenue. They were always carried out to the letter, so that it was not necessary to have the additional man in the gallery. You gentlemen on the Democratic side are a fine lot to talk about obeying orders from the White House.

You had your experience, I think, so you know something about it. You are qualified to speak of it as experts. You had eight years of it, you know, and you know what it means. Oh, gentlemen, this is a somewhat unusual scene for anybody on the Democratic side here to criticize the President for making suggestions. Why, we had nothing but orders here for eight years, and they were all obeyed. Now, I want to say just a word, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As far as I am concerned personally, I do not criticize the President for making suggestions. Is the gentleman going to follow the suggestions that the President has made?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, is the gentleman who is addressing me going to follow them?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so, in so far as I have heard them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am glad the gentleman is able to decide. When the time comes I——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am opposed to what the President suggests so far; I am opposed to ship subsidy. Is the gentleman opposed to that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will cross that bridge when I come to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will understand I am not complaining at the President making suggestions. I was wondering how the gentleman would deal with the suggestions.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am very glad some one on the gentleman's side is not complaining. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was very vigorously complaining about the President making suggestions. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used seven minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am glad to see this pleasure on the Democratic side, as it is very seldom they have had any in any of the elections or any of the primaries or anything that has taken place, and if they can have a little hilarity on the floor it is a highly refreshing incident.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It has not been so educational in so far as the gentleman's attitude is concerned, and as to this question of great moment and grave purport I would be very glad to know the gentleman's position on ship subsidy. He is one of the leaders of the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman compliments me too highly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not intentionally. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is not often that the gentleman from Tennessee sees fit to inquire of me my opinion. If I thought the gentleman would act upon my advice, I would be very glad to give it to him, but he so seldom does I do not feel inclined to give him my opinion at this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, of course the gentleman could not act on the gentleman's advice unless he knew what the advice was. Will the gentleman give——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care to yield for any more colloquy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In reference to this joint resolution we have here before us——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman tell us what the joint resolution is?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have done that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Having been so diverted by the interesting discussion we have had here, will the gentleman explain briefly what the joint resolution is, as we have lost sight of it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is not unusual on that side of the House to lose sight of the real question before the House, and I am not surprised my friend has fallen into that difficulty.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Since the gentleman has made that remark, which is hardly a pertinent observation, since the gentleman, the proponent of the measure, has taken up so much time in irrelevant discussion, I should think——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman wants to be fair. Who started this irrelevant discussion? Was it on our side? I talked about the bill in opening the debate, and some gentleman on the other side rose and talked about something else.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was started and the gentleman certainly has not finished it, because he declined to answer questions put to him in reference to the matters which were being discussed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman wants to ask any question about the bill, I will be glad to answer the question right now.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have no specific knowledge as to this particular measure, and I wanted to ask the gentleman to tell me——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It would simply require a restatement of what I stated before. I stated before this was a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four men from the customs service to work here in Washington as experts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 10 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will take one minute more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does it create any additional offices?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It creates no additional offices, adds no additional expense, requires no appropriation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What are these men expected to do in Washington?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They render expert advice in reference to the enforcement of the customs laws in certain particulars. They have been so used for years, so far back I do not know when, so far as that is concerned. Now, my friend from Texas stated the reason that this joint resolution was necessary was because of a mistake on the part of the Appropriations Committee or of the department. The error was entirely on the part of the department. They sent down the form in reference to the appropriation which it was supposed the department wanted. The Committee on Appropriations in making the appropriation followed the form sent by the department. After it was enacted into law the department discovered it did not authorize them to use these four men who had been used for years. The bill simply corrects the oversight. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who just concluded, said he found much satisfaction in the fact that this side of the House, the Democratic side, was in a good humor this morning. He also stated that during the whole life of this Congress, ever since the Sixty-seventh Congress came into being, the Democrats have been in a "cave of gloom." Yes; the Democratic side of the House has been in a "cave of gloom," but I submit to the gentleman that we have had cause to sit in a "cave of gloom." The people of the United States have also been in a "cave of gloom." We had cause to sit in a "cave of gloom" when a majority of 170 Republicans in this House has so signally failed to redeem its promises; when we recall the fact that you went before the country and promised, like Tittlebat Titmouse in Parliament, to give every man that which he wanted and that which he most desired, and then note that after you obtained office the exports of 1920 of $8,000,000,000, under your rule fall below $5,000,000,000 for 1921. And we saw you, in the face of declining exports and shrinking foreign trade, devoting your time to foisting upon the country a tariff bill to shut out imports and cut down exports, because exports and imports go down together. We have been in a "cave of gloom" and the country has been in a "cave of gloom." Have we not had cause when we have seen the majority side and the administration, with agriculture absolutely going down into the dregs of despair, promising that you were going to do something for it, and instead of really doing something calling a conference on agriculture, and after the conference was over we saw the same condition go marching on?

We have been in a cave of gloom because we have seen an army of four or five million men walking the streets with hungry stomachs and idle hands. What did your party do? It called a conference on unemployment and solemnly denounced unemployment and resolved that you are opposed to it, like you are opposed to the yellow fever and the "flu."

Yes, we have been in a cave of gloom because the Republican Congress and administration have not shown any prospect of doing anything to relieve the conditions, but have spent their time doing what? You have spent your time devising some kind of way whereby you can reward those who have financed your campaign by giving a tariff to favored interests, a bounty to shipping interests, some special privilege to some special interest, at the expense of the whole people. That is why we are in a cave of gloom.

You beat the tom-tom and say, "Look at the Disarmament Conference and see what we did." But we see that the disarmament treaties have not been ratified by a single foreign nation. Yet you boast about your triumphant diplomacy. Those treaties are unratified by a single foreign nation.

But what else do we find in the morning papers? We find in great box-car headlines in the morning papers that the Republican Party is thinking more about offices and jobs than of passing constructive legislation for the benefit of the whole country. The morning paper contains the announcement that 150 Members of Congress have demanded of President Harding that he throw nine women out of the Treasury Department. Why? Are they inefficient? There is no charge that they are. Is it that they are not of good character? There is no charge as to that. Nine women, earning their bread by their own labor in the Treasury Department, and this Congress, composed of men—chivalric men, able-bodied men—going down to the White House with a petition signed by 150, saying, "Give us these jobs; take these jobs away from these women who are faithful and competent and give us these jobs, because we need them in order to reward some of our election workers. The gentleman is right—the Democrats, as well as the country, are in a "cave of gloom." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, the thing entirely in order now seems to be to talk about something entirely irrelevant. Yesterday we passed a bill pertaining to the Panama Canal Zone, and containing a divorce law. I was very much opposed to some points in that divorce law, but I could not get opportunity to discuss them. Yet I am not willing to let the whole matter pass without definitely uttering my protest.

In this bill we are giving to the Canal Zone its first law on the divorce question. That law certainly ought to be seriously considered and carefully framed, for we are dealing with a matter which touches the happiness of homes and the social and moral conditions of people.

The divorce law which we pass for the Canal Zone will perhaps for generations affect the ideals and morals of those who make their homes in the zone and possibly of those who come and go. We are, perhaps, giving the tone to things in a new country, where the social order as now shaped will continue for years to come.

Certainly no one will deny that the family is the most vital unit and the home the most vital institution in our whole economic and social system. Whatever injures the home and the family relationship poisons the very fountain from which our civilization flows.

The marriage tie between man and woman is the bond that holds the home together. Violate that and you begin the disintegration of our whole social system. Give to a people lax principles and views on the sacredness of the marriage relation and you have laid the foundation for a rotten condition of morals.

Law is a great educator. People generally come more and more to approve what the law sustains. This bill makes too easy the cancellation of the marriage vow. It provides for nine legal grounds of divorce. I am inclined to approve the plan of the State of South Carolina, which provides for no final divorce, and hence does not allow either party to marry another after separation.

At most I feel sure we ought to have not more than two or three legal grounds for divorce, and at most only one ground on which the divorced person could marry another. We shall never find anything better than the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth on this or any other moral question.

We can not afford by our legislation or in any other way to inculcate into our young men and women a loose idea of the sacredness or the "bindingness" of the marriage obligation. When we lead our people to consider marriage a light matter and a condition that can be put on and off at one's caprice and pleasure, we are preparing the way for a future of sin, sorrow, and trouble.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Four minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what to do with these four minutes. If there is anybody on the Republican side, and I see two or three gentlemen from Massachusetts here, that wants to say a word in defense of this statesman from Massachusetts, I will now yield to them. Up to date there has not been one word said in behalf of this crux, and I thought somebody ought to say a word.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have nothing to say.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] says he has nothing to say, and there are many others who will not have anything to say.

I knew John Weeks when he was here. He was a very active Representative. I think he made a capable Senator, but I will tell you what is the matter. He represents, more typically than any other man in this country, the old line stand-pat Republicanism. And he is speaking the mind of the President, and many gentlemen on your side over there know it. You know that John Weeks, when he makes these speeches against primary laws, and against progressivism, and against the farm bloc, is doing nothing but reflecting the conversations and the ideas that come from his chief around the Cabinet table. He is merely echoing the voice of the administration, especially the President of the United States. So you must not hold him too much responsible for obeying his master. It is natural for a man who occupies a Cabinet position to feel kindly toward the views of the President, especially if those views are in accord with his own. But I imagine from what I see in front of me, in the form of a glass of water on the table for the relief of the fevered condition of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], that he will soon arise in his place and take the balance of the time allotted to the gentleman from Iowa for the purpose of pacing up and down the aisle and getting red in the face, and declaring that the reason for this whole thing is because the Democratic administration left this awful load on our shoulders a year ago last 4th of March. That is the only defense I have heard made, and I think will be his consistent and persistent defense of anything that happens. I can not think of any other defense he will make, except that John's folly, if it is a folly, is the result of an iniquitous Democratic administration of eight years in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be thought to be criticizing John Weeks personally. [Laughter.] I only criticize him as a representative of the G. O. P., because, personally, as I say, I have the kindest feeling for him. But the G. O. P. is to blame. Have you not, 150 of you, said that Andrew Mellon was making a mistake? Of course the G. O. P. is making a mistake. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to disappoint my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER], and therefore I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is altogether mistaken as to the reason for my indulging in a drink of water. I am not feverish. I am simply suffering, as everyone else here is, from the superheated dry hot-air with which the gentlemen on that side have been filling the Chamber. [Laughter and applause.] It made my throat dry. I would not for anything in the world want to feel as badly about the Republican Party as the gentleman from Texas would have you believe that he feels. If we were in as bad a fix as he regrets to say we are, we would be in a bad way indeed, but, of course, he would be delighted.

His colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has admitted what we have all known for a long time, namely, that the gentlemen on that side have been submerged in the deep and dismal and impenetrable gloom of that adverse vote of 7,000,000 which struck them in the fall of 1920, at last they have seen a ray of what they have taken to be encouragement and light. Unlike the minority, we have some differences of opinion. We come from widely separated sections of the country. Our people do not all take exactly the same view on all questions, and we sometimes reflect that difference on the floor, as we should, and as I hope the House of Representatives always will.

In the good old Democratic days of the last administration nobody was supposed to have any opinion on the Democratic side until he had heard from the White House what was to be done. The bills came here, drawn and prepared, and with an injunction, implied if not expressed, that they must not be modified or amended. The gentlemen on that side took them as they came and voted them through, and they did—I will say in order that I may also please the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]—they did, through this legislation and through very odorous maladministration of one kind and another, lay many grievous burdens on the country which the people have had to bear, and they left many serious and trying problems difficult of solution, relative to which, being intelligent folks, we differ sometimes, openly and frankly, as we should, as to the method of their solution.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I have only a minute, and that is mostly gone. But I again beg the gentleman to possess his soul in patience. We are not responsible for the sophomoric utterances of gentlemen who, in appearing before graduates here or there, may express peculiar views. We do not agree with the gentleman on the Democratic side who has spoken and agreed with the Secretary of War that the Congress has gotten to a low ebb. We still insist, notwithstanding there are some Democrats here, that this is a perfectly splendid Congress, the best that there ever was. [Applause.] And we are willing to say that in regard to the minority as well as the majority. I have been here 25 years, and in all my experience I have never known a Congress, even when the present Secretary of War was sitting here, that averaged so well in ability or possessed so high an average of intelligence and independence of thought. [Applause.] That is the sort of House I think that we should have.

Now, we do not always agree on this side. We certainly disagree in the matter of our relation to the White House with the practice of the late unlamented Democratic Congresses. We do cooperate with the White House. We do not receive orders from the Executive. We feel that it is the duty of the Congress to cooperate with the President, and he has been perfectly fine in his spirit of cooperation. [Applause.] We may or may not do all of the things that the gentlemen on that side think we ought to. But of this they may be assured, that we shall proceed in the even tenor of our way, consulting together as to the best thing to be done for the good of the Republic, cooperating with the President, and placing upon the statute books legislation that will, in our opinion, cure the ills from which we have been suffering and raise us out of the slough of despond in which the Democratic administration left the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. All time is expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923, for and in connection with the enforcement of the laws relating to customs, not to exceed at any one time four persons detailed from the field force of the Customs Service.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order that I may tell the Democrats, at least, something about this bill, because I have had so many to ask me about it.

As I understand this resolution, it is merely to reenact what has been the existing law for perhaps half a century. Heretofore we had a lump-sum appropriation for the enforcement of the customs laws, which is, in round numbers, about $10,000,000. There has been a provision authorizing the detail of four men from the field to the District of Columbia for the purpose of serving as experts up in the Treasury Department. These men, as I understand it, are now there and have been for a long time, and they are experts advising the various bureaus. The Committee on Appropriations, either at the suggestion of the Treasury Department or on their own account, struck out this appropriation, and the result was that the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was drawn to it, and he introduced a resolution restoring what had been undone and what had been the custom for 20 or 30 years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then this bill had no reference to the "key positions" that were advertised in the Washington Post this morning?

Mr. GARNER. I can not tell the gentleman from Tennessee whether or not these employees that will be assigned to this particular duty from the field service of the customs division will be among the men and women whose names occur in this morning's paper. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he could supply that information?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These gentlemen are under the civil-service rules.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says they are under the civil-service rules. I want the membership to understand that this is merely what has been the law and the custom of Congress for 20 or 30 years. So far as I know there is but one objection to it. This will enable the Treasury Department, of course, to send these experts to San Francisco at the expense of the Government when vacation time comes and let them have a nice ride at the expense of the Government, and a fairly good time if the Treasury Department sees proper to do it. Outside of that, it costs the Government no more than it does under the present arrangement as I understand it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] said these men and women are under the civil service. That may have meant something to the gentleman from Texas, but it does not mean anything to me.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was speaking of these four persons referred to in the resolution. I never heard of these women that are being talked of now.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman was speaking about the people whom we were talking about, was he not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was speaking about the four persons referred to in the joint resolution.

Mr. WINGO. I have not referred to anybody else. I was talking about the people you were talking about that you said were under the civil service. I do not know why the gentleman said that. I was going to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who can usually give me information on any subject that I ask him about, what difference does it make even if they are under the civil service? Does that give them any protection?

Mr. GARNER. So far as my observation goes and the newspaper reports give us any information, whenever this administration gets ready to kick a man out for any reason, whether it is because he is a Democrat or for some other reason, they kick him out. But I want to say that I am not much of a civil-service man and not much of an expert on that business.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. During the last administration a large number of men were detailed to Washington from the field force in the customs service. From time to time under various administrations it has been found advisable to bring to Washington some persons from New York or Boston because of special information they had acquired from direct contact with the customs business. Sometimes it has been found necessary to send persons from Washington to clear up some tangled conditions at particular ports. Sometimes the business in Washington supplements the work in the field and sometimes the work in the field will supplement the business in Washington. Under the law for an extended period of time the Secretary of the Treasury has had the authority to call men from the field to Washington. A specified number were authorized. But during the last eight years, under the Democratic administration, a larger number of these field men than the law allows was called to Washington. One of these men received $12 per diem for his services and when called to Washington drew $5 per day for his expenses also, making $17 per day for that service. He was here year in and year out when his headquarters were in Philadelphia or other places. Another man from field headquarters in Baltimore detailed to service in Washington at approximately $10 per day drew a per diem of $5 per day in connection therewith.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will yield when I finish this statement. On that basis these men were called to account in the audit of their claims, and that is the subject that has raised this issue. That is the question that brought out this statement, whatever it may have been in detail as furnished to the Committee on Ways and Means. If you will go back along that line you will find men to-day in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, placed there under the last administration, still drawing pay from a field pay roll, with a per diem possible under the circumstances. Now I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just want to ask if these two high-priced fellows brought from Philadelphia happened to be Republicans?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They are both Democrats, and I know them personally.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad to hear that a couple of Democrats landed for once. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; they were brought here by a Democratic administration, nursed by a Democratic administration, and when called to account by the present Republican administration they were sent back to the field, and one of them is now out of the service.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration H. J. Res. 344, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Private Calendar was made in order to-day. The Clerk will begin the call where he left off on the previous Private Calendar day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the order that was entered last evening provide for these bills being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the bills on the Private Calendar in order to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that these bills may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANNA M. TOBIN.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Private Calendar 203—objected to at a former time—a bill (S. 2323) for the relief of Anna M. Tobin.

Mr. WALSH. What is the use of entering into others and then going back?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to make a statement, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit.

Mr. WALSH. I heard the gentleman's statement the other day.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to the gentleman that I have certain data here called for by certain gentlemen that I would like to submit to the House, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. WALSH. We have used up 1 hour and 25 minutes which we expected to be devoted to the Private Calendar on another bill. If the gentleman is permitted to return to this bill, there is no reason why the privilege should not be granted to other gentlemen to return to their bills that were objected to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I take it that there is a gentleman over on that side who indicated the other day that he would like to have certain data that I want to furnish.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the data that he wishes, and then it will be available.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It will be available, but I would like to give it to the House. The question was whether or not the bill had been approved by the Secretary of War, and I have the report of a former committee which shows that the Secretary of War did approve the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. If I may be allowed to suggest, many bills have been passed over as objected to, and in a number of them I think it is probably true that after they were passed gentlemen have been able to explain to gentlemen who objected that the reasons for the objection were not sound. But if we return to this bill, as asked for by the gentleman from Texas, we can not refuse to return to other bills. My hope is that we may have another day on the Private Calendar, but I think it important to go through the calendar now from the point where we left off.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not think the bill would have been objected to if the committee had incorporated in the report the data that was incorporated in a former report. This bill is in favor of a widow lady who had her property destroyed. I feel sure that there would have been no objection to the bill if the data had been furnished at the time.

Mr. CRAMTON. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I should have to object to the bill to-day if it was returned to, but I will be glad to have the data put in the RECORD.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If the gentleman wants to object to a bill giving a poor widow lady money that is due her for property destroyed by soldiers, a claim that the War Department has approved, he may object, but I am sure if he would take time to read this report he would not. I wish to insert in the RECORD a part of a former report made by the Claims Committee last year, showing an itemized statement, and also a letter from the Secretary of War approving this claim and stating that Congress should make provision for paying it.

The part of the former report is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 5, 1916.

From: J. F. Woodson, El Paso, Tex.
To: Gen. Frederick D. Funston.
Subject: Reports damage by Pennsylvania troops to property of Mrs. Tobin, of Tobin, Tex. No objection to troops using property as drill grounds or other legitimate purposes. Desires guard for property.

INSPECTOR, SEVENTH DIVISION, N. G. U. S.,
Camp Stewart, El Paso, Tex., September 20, 1916.

The COMMANDING GENERAL DIVISION,
Camp Stewart, El Paso, Tex.

Returned with report. This day, in company with J. F. Woodson, Esq., counsel for Mrs. Tobin, of El Paso, Tex., and Mr. Coles, of the same place, I visited the premises alleged to have been damaged and found marked evidence of wanton damage to the several buildings in the nature of broken windows, doors, plumbing fixtures, damaged and defaced interior and exterior woodwork; some of the plumbing fixtures and woodwork are missing, the fire engine has been stripped of all metal parts detachable, and in many cases parts have been knocked off, thus breaking the fixtures, and the same is true of the water pump. If all this damage was done by the militia, their injury to Mrs. Tobin would be substantial, and Mr. Coles estimates the cost of restoring the same to its former condition at not less than $1,000. From pencil marks on the walls and woodwork it appears that it was not alone boys from Pennsylvania, but from Rhode Island, Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Kentucky who took part in this destruction, and that some of the visits to the premises have been up until shortly before this investigation. At the time of the original damage and complaint General Clements did offer to have the parties found upon the premises make restoration, but in the presence of the offenders the representation was made on behalf of Mrs. Tobin that she did not care that the boys should do this, but was anxious that a guard should be established about the premises for the protection thereof from further injury. General Clements is of the opinion that had he been permitted to handle this matter as he thought best, all future trouble should have been avoided, and Mrs. Tobin saved the damage to her property and the expense of maintaining a civilian guard. As shown by the draft attached to Mr. Woodson's letter, it will be seen the premises in question are at least 1 mile distant from our nearest troops and is on the opposite side of the railroad and beyond the limits of Camp Stewart. To-day Mr. Woodson stated his intention to make claim for the damage done, and in this connection further stated he thought this burden should rest upon the United States. In addition, he asks a guard be furnished from this division, and from reasons apparent from the above report General Clements declined to do this.

M. M. TAGGART,
Major, Inspector Seventh Division, N. G. U. S.

REPORT OF INVESTIGATION OF DAMAGE DONE TO THE PROPERTY OF MRS. FRANK R. TOBIN, TOBIN, TEX.

HEADQUARTERS, EL PASO DISTRICT,
El Paso, Tex., October 26, 1916.

This ranch is located on the El Paso & Southwestern Railway, about 1 mile north of the camp of the Pennsylvania troops. On October 23 I called on Major General Clements, commanding the Pennsylvania (Seventh) Division, for the purpose of ascertaining what information he had as to the damage done to the Tobin property. General Clements stated that some time ago a man claiming to represent Mrs. Tobin came to him with an attorney and represented that damage had been done to the property at Tobin and stated that the amount of the damage was $30. General Clements offered to pay this amount, but the man refused to take it and stated that he did not desire reimbursement, but wished to have some protection against further damage.

Later, further injury was done to the property, but there was no proof that the injury was committed by Pennsylvania troops. Many soldiers had written their names, together with their companies and regiments, on the walls of the houses on the Tobin property. Some of these names were of men belonging to Pennsylvania and many to other State troops. General Clements stated that he had declined to put a guard over this property, as it was at some distance from his camp and the troops of his command were not the only offenders. He caused an investigation to be made by an officer of his command with a view to determining the amount of the damage and responsibility therefor (a copy of the report of this officer, Maj. M. H. Taggart, inspector Seventh Division, hereto attached).

I then visited the property which had been damaged and found there Mr. Charles Phillips, who is now employed by Mrs. Tobin as caretaker. He states that he took charge of the property on August 7, 1916, and that considerable damage had already been done. He has confined his efforts to stopping further damage, but since he has been in charge soldiers have come while he was away and broken into the houses and committed other depredations. Mr. Phillips states that while he is present on the ranch he is unable to prevent depredations, as soldiers come daily and he can not be at all places at the same time. He has devoted himself to protecting the main ranch house and the well.

On the walls of the ranch house and other buildings and on the boiler of the steam fire engine a great many men have written names and organizations. These are principally from the First, Second, and Third Pennsylvania Regiments. Some are from Massachusetts and Rhode Island regiments and a few scattering names from Kentucky and South Carolina regiments. Mr. Phillips states that a great majority of the damage was done before the Kentucky regiments arrived. I took the names of a number of these men and found that the organizations of most of them had been ordered home for muster out. Those that I was able to interview claimed that they merely visited the ranch while out walking, and finding the names of many men written on the wall, added theirs to the list. They knew nothing as to who committed the depredations other than defacing the walls by writing on them.

Most of the destruction that I observed appeared to be pure vandalism—articles that were removed having no value and no conceivable use. Windows have been smashed and doors torn off the hinges. A steam fire engine, housed in an outbuilding, has had all removable parts wrenched from it. The pump at the well had been dismantled and many of the parts broken. Judging from the appearance of the steam fire engine, it was not in a serviceable condition when the National Guard came to El Paso, but numerous parts of some value have been removed. A number of school benches were removed from the schoolhouse and carried away. Five dwellings, a store, and a schoolhouse have been damaged as has been indicated. Some of the smaller outbuildings have had doors torn off, but have suffered no other substantial damage. Two of the dwellings and some of the houses and the store are apparently old buildings, the board flooring having rotted, but three of the dwellings and the schoolhouse are substantial stone or brick buildings of one story, practically new, and evidently until recently in a good state of repair.

The caretaker, Mr. Phillips, states that he visited this ranch last spring, before the militia arrived, as census enumerator for the school district; that he then entered each of three houses then occupied, and that they were then in good repair in every respect.

I am unable to report as to the exact value of the damage done to this ranch, but I do not believe an estimate of $1,000 is excessive.

Mr. J. F. Woodson, attorney for Mrs. Tobin, states that he is unable to give the names of the organizations of the men who committed the depredations on the Tobin property. He first reported the matter to General Clements about August 1, 1916. Shortly after the Pennsylvania troops arrived he noticed upon visiting the ranch that the pump had been dismantled and several pieces broken. He then caught soldiers taking away in a wagon brick and some doors which they had wrenched from one of the houses. The men gave fictitious names, but Mr. Woodson was convinced that they were from the Pennsylvania division, then the only organization camped near the Tobin property. He reported the matter to General Clements, division commander, who sent an aid with Mr. Woodson to the ranch, where they again found some soldiers carrying away brick. The aid arrested these men and took them back to camp. Mr. Woodson asked General Clements not to try them. General Clements offered to pay for the damage done shortly after the Pennsylvania troops came to El Paso. Mr. Woodson told him that he did not want pay, but he did want a guard detailed to prevent further damage. General Clements refused to detail a guard to protect the property. Report of the matter was not made to General Bell. Major Taggart, of the Pennsylvania division, on investigation made a few days afterwards promised that a guard would be established. The material part of the damage to this property was done before any other than the Pennsylvania troops arrived.

There seems to be no doubt that the injuries complained of in the letter of Mr. Woodson were committed by soldiers. I am unable to obtain convincing evidence as to the command to which these men belong, but from the fact that the Pennsylvania division has for more than three months past been camped nearer this property than any other organization, that the majority of names found written on the walls and other places in the ranch are of men belonging to Pennsylvania troops, and that members of this command have been arrested while committing depredations on the ranch, I am of the opinion that by far the larger part of the injury was done by Pennsylvania troops.

On October 25 several soldiers who claimed to be members of Company F, Eighteenth Pennsylvania, were caught carrying away property and their names were reported to the chief of staff of the Pennsylvania division, whereupon a guard from that division was established over the property and is now maintained.

In the absence of sufficient evidence to fix responsibility for the damage suffered by Mrs. Tobin on particular individuals or organizations of the Army, it is deemed but just that Mrs. Tobin should be reimbursed by the Government. If no funds are available for the purpose, I recommend that Mrs. Tobin be asked to submit a detailed statement of the amount of damages done, and when this has been verified Congress be asked to appropriate the money.

J. MCL. CARTER,
Colonel of Cavalry, District Inspector.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 24, 1921.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated January 18, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 1533, an act for the relief of Anna M. Tobin, independent executrix of the estate of Frank R. Tobin, deceased, and requesting an expression of my opinion as to the merits of the claim.

In reply thereto I desire to inform you that the amount ($1,500) indicated in the bill is believed to be excessive. The sum of $1,000 is believed to be a just amount for relief in this case. With the foregoing exception I am of the opinion that this claim is a just one, and recommend that, if the amount be changed to $1,000, S. 1533 be enacted.

Respectfully,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

STATE OF TEXAS, County of El Paso:

Before me, the undersigned authority, on this day personally appeared H. T. Ponsford, known to me to be a credible person, who, being by me duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says:

A few days prior to August 20, 1918, in compliance with and in company with J. F. Woodson, of El Paso, Tex., I visited the houses situated a few miles northerly from El Paso, Tex., and known as Tobin, Tex., which I am informed and believe belonged to Mrs. Anna M. Tobin, widow of Frank R. Tobin, deceased. I am and have been for many years a contractor and builder in El Paso County, Tex., and Mr. Woodson, who was the attorney of Mrs. Tobin, requested that I make this trip with him in order to make an estimate of damages that had been done to some improvements on that property known as Tobin, Tex., and he wanted me to estimate what said damages amounted to, and so we went to the place and I found that damage had been done and that repairs of such damage at such time would cost in the amounts hereinafter set out, and the material furnished cost the amounts hereinafter set out, and in order to specify the different items I set them out as hereinafter set out, all as follows:

Total of above work, $1,283.60.

And I state that such prices were based upon prices in August, 1918, which, of course, would be more now, as prices are higher now, and in estimating such prices I carried out the instruction given me by Mr. Woodson and estimated the damage as low as possible.

H. T. PONSFORD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me at El Paso, Tex., this 20th day of January, A. D. 1921.

[SEAL.] D. P. ARMSTRONG,
Notary Public, El Paso County, Tex.

HORACE G. KNOWLES.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8656) for the relief of Horace G. Knowles.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I can not quite see the equity of this. The bill provides for the payment in a case in which the general law specifically provides that there should be no payment. Unless the gentleman has further information than is contained in the report, I shall be constrained to object.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not take that view of the proposition. Horace G. Knowles, for whose relief this bill was drawn, was a minister to Rumania and Serbia. He was ordered from that post to Washington by the State Department, having been appointed minister to Nicaragua. While he was in Washington he was ordered to stay here and receive instructions before proceeding to his post. Before the end of 30 days complications arose between the United States and the place for which he had been recently appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, so that he was an absolute officer of the United States in the regular order. These complications having arisen, the Secretary of State directed Mr. Knowles not to proceed to his place of assignment. Mr. Knowles stayed here, and when the 30 days' instruction was over he was again ordered by the Secretary of State to stay in Washington and not proceed to Nicaragua, to which post he had been appointed and confirmed by the Senate as minister plenipotentiary. He was a servant of the United States regularly appointed and confirmed by the Senate, and I assert that he was a commissioned officer, and it makes no difference whether he proceeded to his post or not if he was acting under the orders of his superior. He was an officer of the United States confirmed and commissioned. I was going to raise the question whether Horace Greeley Knowles was not entitled, not to some of his salary as provided for in this bill but whether he was not entitled to all of his salary regularly denominated by law and not to a fraction of his salary. I introduced the bill. I believe that the bill was absolutely honest in every way. I could not and can not understand how the Secretary of State could reach the conclusion that he was entitled only to a fraction of his pay. I do not see it now. In my judgment, he was entitled to all of the pay or none of it, and I would like to ask the committee whether there is any law for what Mr. Huntington, the Assistant Secretary of State, did. Under what law did he say that he would only grant him half pay up to the 22d of July? If there is any such law on the statute book, that ends that contention; but if there is not, I say that he was entitled as a commissioned officer, holding a commission, having been regularly appointed and confirmed, to his whole salary as long as he was acting under the orders of his superior officer, the Secretary of State.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman read the report on the bill?

Mr. LAYTON. I have read it very carefully, because I introduced the bill myself. I think Mr. Knowles is entitled to all that was put in the bill as I introduced it, his entire salary, as long as he was under the orders of his superior officer. That is my contention. But the committee, instead of giving him $7,296, has made a report giving him $1,666.67. What right had the Secretary of State to say that he should have only half up to a certain time, when he served properly and legally? I am asking for information. I can not find any law to support it. Under the law he is entitled to $10,000 a year as a commissioned officer. He was a commissioned officer; he had a commission; he was appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate as minister plenipotentiary, and after certain international complications arose he was ordered to stay in Washington, and he stayed in Washington, obeying orders. If he had not obeyed orders, it is plain his commission would have been revoked for insubordination. This was his dilemma, and he should not be punished for showing proper regard for those above him in the Government service. He did not seek any private business. He considered that he was under the orders of the administration, and he stayed here without being able to make a penny of any kind in any other employment. I think under the circumstances, as I said before, that he is entitled to his whole pay until he was dismissed properly or until he was appointed to some other position.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, of course the law provides, when a person has been appointed to a diplomatic post, that unless he proceeds to his position within 30 days he is not entitled to any compensation. It does not make any difference whether the delay is by reason of orders of his superior or is his own delay. The comptroller very clearly points out that this is a case in which they desire to take this particular person out from under the operations of the general law. That, of course, is the reason why the amount is reduced. I do not believe under the facts, as set forth in the report as found by the committee, that there is any equity in this particular claim, and I regret that I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask upon what basis of fairness or equity he refuses to have this bill considered?

Mr. WALSH. Because, as I have stated, this is a case giving this man particular preference in the face of a statute of the United States which was in existence at that time.

Mr. LAYTON. And in the face of a complication which the law never contemplated, in the first place.

Mr. WALSH. The law does not say anything about complications. It is a very plain law. It governs cases such as this. It has covered cases such as this before, and it probably will in the future, and until that law is changed I do not think we ought by special legislation to contravene it.

Mr. LAYTON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that every claim that comes from the Committee on Claims comes here, because there is no law to take care of it. It comes here into a court of equity. That is the very reason why it does come, so that any bill so passed creates new law to cover the case. If not, there would be no need for the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but it does not come in the face of law, as this does. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GEORGE R. CAMPBELL, MILTON B. GERMOND, AND WALTER D. LONG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 513) for the relief of George R. Campbell, Milton B. Germond, and Walter D. Long.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire whether these claimants were performing any work while they were waiting for orders to continue their survey work.

Mr. McARTHUR. According to my understanding these men remained idle in the field and were doing nothing, because this was work that they were ordered to do by the branch of the Government under which they were working.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McARTHUR. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is not the very same principle involved in this bill that was involved in the previous bill?

Mr. McARTHUR. I did not listen to the discussion in respect to the previous bill and I therefore could not say.

Mr. LAYTON. They were awaiting orders, were they not?

Mr. McARTHUR. These men were awaiting orders in the field.

Mr. LAYTON. They were not doing anything?

Mr. McARTHUR. They were not doing anything.

Mr. LAYTON. In the previous case the man was awaiting orders from the Secretary of State of the United States, admitted to be so doing, no denial of it.

Mr. McARTHUR. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that these men expected momentarily to receive orders, but the orders did not come. They went through a long period of enforced idleness, and they were under expense all of that time for their maintenance.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the prior case to which the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] refers, the claimant received notice from an accredited representative of the Government that his pay would stop on a certain date, and he had no expectation of returning to work because of the Secretary of State.

Mr. LAYTON. And yet at the same time, having been duly appointed, the man was ordered to stay in Washington for the purpose of going to Nicaragua just as soon as the complications between the two countries were removed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question the statement of fact made by the gentleman, that he was ordered to remain in Washington.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman can question it if he wants to, but there is no doubt about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Huntington Wilson, is very clear as to the orders he gave to Knowles at the time when he told him that the conditions would not permit of his being sent to Nicaragua. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George R. Campbell, Milton B. Germond, and Walter D. Long, their heirs or assigns, the sum of $5,034.75, being the amount due them for services performed as United States deputy surveyors, in accordance with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury contained in House Document No. 683, Sixty-second Congress, second session.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McARTHUR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN ANDERSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9160) to reimburse John Anderson, former postmaster at Sanborn, Knox County, Ind., for stamps and funds stolen from the post office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Anderson, former postmaster at Sanborn, Knox County, Ind., the sum of $358.90, the same being the amount of money and stamps stolen from the post office at Sanborn, Knox County, Ind., on the night of February 18, 1907, by persons unknown.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, strike out "Sanborn" and insert "Sandborn."

Line 8, strike out "Sanborn" and insert "Sandborn."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read:

A bill for the relief of John Anderson.

SOUTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7010) for relief of Southern Transportation Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this bill in the usual form for sending a claim of this kind to the district court?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this bill was prepared by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL]. I have glanced over the bill, and although I can not say definitely I think it is in the usual form. I have prepared such bills myself. I think this is in the usual form.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know how much damages are claimed?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. The report shows $1,200. It will be found on the first page of the report.

Mr. WALSH. But is that offset in any way by damages to the Government vessel?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I think not. I do not find in there any damages sustained by the Government vessel. It will be found on the second page of the report that the naval board investigation found that the naval officer in charge of the U. S. S. Kewaydin—that is, the tug towing the barge—was at fault.

Mr. WALSH. It was found he did not exercise enough foresight——

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. In maneuvering, and that there was ample space for him to pass the barge, which was at anchor.

Mr. WALSH. I thought it was another of those claims of such character that might be settled by the Navy Department under the general law, but I see it perhaps requires too much reduction of what they set up for damages. I have no objection.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present.

BENJAMINE O. KERLEE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 494) for the relief of Benjamine O. Kerlee.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a Senate bill, which I have not had an opportunity to examine, and I would like some one to make a statement in reference to it. Is there anybody here familiar with the circumstances of this case? Well, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill..

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Benjamine O. Kerlee the sum of $1,200, for injuries received while employed in the service of the Government as a workman in the Kaniksu National Forest in the State of Idaho during the year 1915.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "Benjamine" and insert "Benjamin."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "An act for the relief of Benjamin O. Kerlee."

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9887) for the relief of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of some member of the committee as to the status of the general bill which passed the House some time ago authorizing the department to settle claims of this character under an amount, I believe, of $500 or $1,000?

Mr. GLYNN. I will say to the gentleman that bill is still in the Senate committee, and I understand it is likely to be reported favorably by that committee in about 10 days; but it has not come up for action in the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amount, as I recall it, carried in that bill, authorizing settlement by the department, was $1,000.

Mr. GLYNN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the sum of $285.86, to compensate the said company for damages caused by collision of the Coast Guard cutter Guthrie with the Pennsylvania Railroad car float No. 7, at Philadelphia, Pa., November 26, 1920.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GLYNN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN B. ELLIOTT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1784) for the relief of John B. Elliott.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John B. Elliott, whose position as collector of customs of collection district numbered 27 (formerly known as the district of southern California), was inadvertently abolished under the provisions of the Executive order of February 2, 1920, the salary he would have received as collector of customs of the newly created district numbered 27 (known as the district of Los Angeles) from February 2, 1920, to April 5, 1920, inclusive, had not his position been so abolished.

Passed the Senate February 20, 1922.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, after the word "pay," add a comma and the following, "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GLYNN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GULF, FLORIDA, & ALABAMA RAILWAY CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2599) for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PHILIP S. EVEREST.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1730) for the relief of Philip S. Everest.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300, and that the same be paid to Philip S. Everest, superintendent and special disbursing agent Bad River (Wis.) Indian Reservation, in full compensation on account of moneys expended by him for the benefit of an Indian allottee upon said reservation whose allotment had been erroneously located by said agent through misinformation given to him as to the location of a reservation corner.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. A. P. NELSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10361) authorizing the sale and patent of certain alleged public lands in Louisiana.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois). Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and patent to Thomas Glynn, William Glynn, Alphonse Glynn, Charles Glynn, Aloysius Glynn, Alexander Glynn, Emma Glynn, Josephine Glynn, and Belle Glynn, of Pointe Coupee, La., lot or section 39, lots 5, 6, 7, 12, and 13, section 27, and lots 1 and 2 of section 26, township 5, range 11, Louisiana meridian west of the Mississippi River, situated in Pointe Coupee Parish, La., at $1.25 per acre, lands which they and their grantors have occupied, under claim and color of title from the State of Louisiana, ever since May 3, 1854: Provided, That application for the purchase of the described tracts under this authorization be filed at the United States land office in Baton Rouge, La., within 60 days from the passage of this act.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "five," insert the word "south."
Page 1, line 10, after the word "eleven," insert the word "east."
Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "Pointe Coupee" and insert "West Baton Rouge."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I note the gentleman introducing the bill is in the Chamber. I want to ask the gentleman if he is personally acquainted with the character of this land?

Mr. FAVROT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any oil deposits on the land?

Mr. FAVROT. There are not any oil deposits on the land within about 300 miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is ordinary agricultural land?

Mr. FAVROT. Ordinary agricultural land.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FAVROT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SANFORD KIRKPATRICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2763) for the relief of Sanford Kirkpatrick.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Sanford Kirkpatrick, of Ottumwa, Iowa, the sum of $2,191 on account of injuries received while in the discharge of his duty as special agent under the collector of internal revenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEYER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN CALVIN STARR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10287) for the relief of John Calvin Starr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the compensation in this measure seems to be a little out of the ordinary. The bill was introduced for $25,000, and the committee has amended it to $5,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The committee said that this was the greatest amount they ever granted in injury cases.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes. The committee grants $5,000 in injury cases and $1,500 where death results. Has the gentleman any information about this?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The man came to my office a few days ago. He is a total wreck. His wife has to assist him, and he has a big cane that he carries to support him when his wife is not with him. He is physically an absolute wreck. I do not see how it is possible for him ever to do any work. I do not see how it is possible for him to ever be able to follow any employment of any kind. We were careful about it. We asked the physicians at Fort McHenry to make a thorough examination, the result of which the gentleman will find in the report, and after a thorough examination and consultation for some length of time they came to the conclusion that there was no possibility of his ever recovering from the accident. That you will find embodied in the report. I will say to the gentleman that if there ever was a worthy case, this is certainly one of them. I am thoroughly familiar with it. I know the people themselves.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says that the beneficiary is totally incapacitated?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely so.

Mr. WALSH. And it is the gentleman's judgment that he will continue in that condition?

Mr. LINTHICUM. From my observation, that is my judgment; and from the report of the physicians and their examination, that is their judgment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Calvin Starr the sum of $25,000 for personal injuries sustained as result of being struck by runaway Government-owned mail truck.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures and words: "$5,000 in full settlement against the Government."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARTHUR E. RUMP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 154) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Arthur E. Rump.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the first time, I believe, in the consideration of the Private Calendar where after a person who has been employed by the Government has received some compensation he has been placed as a beneficiary under the compensation act passed in 1916. He has already received $2,000.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement giving the facts in the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would be glad to have some explanation as to the facts in the case as now existing.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The question of the gentleman from Wisconsin is a perfectly pertinent one.

About 15 years ago Arthur Rump was a strong, vigorous, athletic fellow, in perfect health, and was employed in the St. Louis post office in the registry division. One day while at work in his line of duty at the substation in the Union Station he was walking with a parcel of registered letters. As he went along between the mail cars there was a railway mail clerk in one of the cars who had become angry because a package of papers had been placed in his car by mistake, and instead of dropping it down on the truck beside the car he hurled it out into the space designated as the safety zone for the employees to walk through, and it hit this man in the neck and knocked him down, rendered him unconscious, and injured his spine. Rump went back to his work after two or three days, but he suffered all the time. After a year or two his neck began to stiffen. They had it examined by X-ray, and the doctors were convinced that the injury never would heal, and so they put him in a plaster of Paris cast to ankylose the joints of the neck. About nine months afterwards he was taken out of the cast, and it was found that his neck was perfectly stiff and the pain was gone. But the affliction progressed until his hips and knees were stiff, and the joints in his feet became rigid, and he was helpless.

After his affliction had progressed until he was no longer able to walk and was confined to his bed, his faithful wife undertook to earn a living for him and his aged mother by touching up negatives for a photographer. She was fairly successful in this work for about five years, when she was stricken with a cancer. This disease ate rapidly into her vitals. As her condition became serious Congress passed a relief bill for her husband allowing him $2,000 for his injuries. The voucher making payment under this bill reached Mr. Rump after his wife had become unconscious and only five days before she died. The amount was totally inadequate for his injuries, but as he had no money with which to pay doctor bills and funeral expenses for his wife, he was not in a position to reject it. He accepted the payment in full faith that at some future date Congress would do justice by him and give him an adequate compensation for his injuries.

At the time the bill was passed he could use both arms and hands, and by the use of a telephone he earned from $400 to $500 per year soliciting magazine subscriptions. At that time Congress was under the impression that the progress of his disease had been arrested and that he would be able in the future to earn at least a part of his livelihood. In this Congress was mistaken, because his affliction has traveled until to-day there is not a joint in his body that he can move, except he can open his mouth about one-quarter of an inch.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is his age at present?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think it is 48. Now, this bill was reported last year by the Judiciary Committee, but never got to a vote. It came up in the Senate at this session and passed, placing him under the provisions of the workman's compensation law; the bill then came to the Claims Committee of the House. The title of this bill is not correct, because the Claims Committee of the House did not want to make a precedent of putting him under the compensation law. They gave him instead a pension of $60 per month during his natural life.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill under consideration places him under the compensation act.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If you will read the bill, you will find that this is not the case. It is not under the compensation act. The Senate bill is stricken out and an amendment inserted giving him $60 per month.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have before me the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. All after the enacting clause of the Senate bill was stricken out, and they inserted a provision fixing his compensation at $60 per month. I will tell you that this man is not asking for charity. He was injured without any fault of his own, while serving the Government in the line of his duty. All he wants is justice. There is not a man on earth in a more pitiable condition. If you put food and drink beside him, he would starve to death or die from thirst because of his helplessness.

About a year ago the Compensation Board, under the compensation law passed by this Congress, paid a Greek $14,000 for injuries sustained while employed by the Government. Within the past year that board paid a man in New Jersey, who had lost one arm and one eye, $11,000. They paid a man out in Missouri, who had lost both eyes, $13,000, and while Arthur Rump was injured before the compensation law was enacted there would certainly be no injustice done in paying him $60 per month during the remainder of his natural life.

All the evidence in this case shows that this man was not in fault at all. He was discharging his duty faithfully, and by the pure carelessness of another employee he was put in a condition where he lives on with a brain that is active but can not move hand or foot. It is my contention, and it is the contention of the committee, that the first compensation allowed him was totally inadequate. There is a poorhouse four blocks from where he lives, and it is the horror of his life that he may have to go to that poorhouse. He is certainly entitled to relief from that anxiety.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the payment of $60 should begin after the passage of the act.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is written in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not find it in here. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting after the word "month" the words "to date after the passage of the act"?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Certainly not. That was the understanding in the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Arthur E. Rump, a former employee in the post office in St. Louis, Mo., the provision of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Arthur E. Rump, during his natural life, the sum of $60 per month as compensation for injuries sustained while in the line of his duties as registry clerk at the St. Louis, Mo., post office, said monthly payments to be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 4, of the committee amendment, after the word "month," insert "to date from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 4, after the word "month," insert "to date from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The title should be amended, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MRS. D. MONTGOMERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1965) for the relief of Mrs. D. Montgomery.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have difficulty, in examining the report, in finding a detailed statement of the expenses for which the bill makes allowances.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will yield, he will find the statement on pages 2 and 3 of the report. I will say to the gentleman that this is one of the most meritorious claims ever presented in connection with any accident growing out of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so, and perhaps I should not have raised the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. SNELL. The amount of the bill will hardly pay the hospital expenses—$200.90. All the evidence before the committee is explained in full in the report. I think it is a very just claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The reservation is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. D. Montgomery, of Carrollton, Tex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200.90 to cover expenses incurred for hospital service rendered to Mrs. D. Montgomery and child as a result of injuries sustained by the forced landing of an airplane owned by the United States Government and operated by an officer of the United States Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HEIRS OF JULIO CARRAZCO, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 156) for the relief of the heirs of Julio Carrazco, deceased.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will some member of the committee inform the House whether it is the policy of the Government to compensate foreigners in case of death because of the accidental shooting of relatives by some of our Army enlisted men?

Mr. GLYNN. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that it is the policy; and last session, when we had up private bills, a number of such bills were passed. In every instance it was upon the recommendation of the Department of State or some other department of the Government. This case comes to us with the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

They state that—

While no legal liability rests upon our Government to indemnify the dependents of Carrazco for their loss, it is believed that an indemnity should be paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay $2,000 to the dependents of Julio Carrazco, a citizen of Mexico, who was killed by United States troops near Los Adobes, in the district of El Indio, Tex., on January 18, 1918, which said sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

DELAWARE & HUDSON CO., OF NEW YORK CITY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 636) for the relief of the Delaware & Hudson Co., of New York City.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Delaware & Hudson Co. of New York City the sum of $1,711.65, to reimburse said company in the amount of a fine imposed upon and paid by it in June, 1918, because of irregular delivery, without customs formality, of a shipment consigned to the collector of customs, for depot quartermaster, United States Army, Philadelphia, Pa.; the duty having been subsequently paid by the depot quartermaster, and the fine having been covered into the Treasury before the notice of withdrawal of the report of irregular delivery was received by the collector of customs at Ogdensburg, N. Y., where said fine had been paid.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Delaware & Hudson Co. of New York City the sum of $1,711.65, in reimbursement of a fine imposed and paid by said company, June 8, 1918, to the collector of customs for the irregular delivery of a shipment of Army underwear consigned to the collector of customs and shipped from Quebec, Canada, to the depot quartermaster at Philadelphia, Pa."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VIVIAN HOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 862) for the relief of Vivian Hood.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the author of the bill [Mr. DOWELL] a question. The report in this case does not disclose whether this exhibition given by the Chemical Warfare Service, whereby the claimant, who was a spectator, suffered injury was a free exhibition or whether there was a fee charged.

Mr. DOWELL. It was a free exhibition given by the United States Chemical Warfare Bureau, a division of the War Department, at the State fair grounds at Des Moines, Iowa, and this exhibition was extensively advertised.

Mr. WALSH. And people were invited to witness it.

Mr. DOWELL. The people were invited to attend this exhibition given by the United States Chemical Warfare Bureau, and the entertainment was free to the public. This claimant, Vivian Hood, with many others, attended this exhibition upon this invitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the report nothing was disclosed to show whether it was a free exhibition or whether it was in connection with a State fair or something of that kind, to which the claimant might have recourse. On the statement of the gentleman, there being no other recourse, I have no objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal guardian of the estate of Vivian Hood, a minor, of Des Moines, Polk County, Iowa, the sum of $10,000, in full compensation for injuries and damages sustained by the said Vivian Hood on the 15th day of May, 1920, while the said Vivian Hood, without carelessness or negligence on her part, and while the said Vivian Hood was seated in the grandstand provided for that purpose, witnessing an exhibition given by the United States Chemical Warfare Bureau at the State Fair Ground, in Des Moines, Iowa, said injuries and damages were sustained by the said Vivian Hood by reason of a gas shell being exploded by the officers and men of the said Chemical Warfare Bureau, at said time and place, the gas shell bursting directly in front and in said grandstand in which said Vivian Hood, together with many other spectators, was seated, fragment of said shell striking said Vivian Hood in the face and head, severely cutting, bruising, mangling, and disfiguring the face, head, and nose of said Vivian Hood, which mangling and disfiguring will continue during her life.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line, 5, after the word "appropriated," strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

To Vivian Hood, the sum of $2,500, in full compensation against the Government for injuries sustained as a result of being struck by a fragment of shell May 15, 1920, while witnessing a demonstration party from the Chemical Warfare Service at the State Fair Grounds, Des Moines, Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEONIDAS SAWYER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4145) for the relief of Leonidas Sawyer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Leonidas H. Sawyer, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,500, as compensation for permanent injuries to spine, said injuries being caused through no negligence on his part, and while he was employed in the United States navy yard, known as the Portsmouth Navy Yard, located at Kittery, Me.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Leonidas Sawyer, during his natural life, the sum of $60 per month as compensation for injuries sustained while in the line of his duties as a laborer at the navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H., said monthly payments to be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment; on page 2, line 2, after the word "month," insert the words "to date from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the the committee amendment: On page 2, after the word "month," insert "to date from the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BEEDY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN ALBRECHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4421) for the relief of John Albrecht.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Albrecht the sum of $100 as compensation for damages sustained by him when an airplane of the Air Mail Service descended on his property in March, 1921.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "pay," insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Page 6, strike out the figures "$100" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9472) for the relief of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the purpose of this bill is to remit the fines for the irregular delivery of a shipment of goods because the goods were subsequently delivered into customs custody and later withdrawn and exported under customs supervision.

Mr. KELLER. I have no data except what is in the report. The department said it was irregularly collected, and it seemed to me that if they have collected money irregularly where they had no right to collect it, the Government ought to refund it.

Mr. WALSH. The fine of $50 was imposed for the irregular delivery and shipment of four packages of clothing, and the department further says that the goods were subsequently delivered into the customs custody intact and sent to the general order warehouse, from which the goods were later withdrawn and exported under customs supervision.

Now, I can not gather from the report whether this is an attempt to remit a fine because the goods were recovered and sent through the regular channel, or whether it is attempting to remit a fine because the irregularity which occurred was without the fault of the railway company.

Mr. KELLER. It was because it was without fault of the railway company. The railroad immediately paid the fine because it had no other recourse. They knew that they were paying it irregularly.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50, and such sum is hereby appropriated to reimburse the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. for customs fine in connection with shipment of four packages of old clothes covered by immediate transportation entry No. 122, of November, 1919, erroneously imposed by the collector of customs at Richford, Vt.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 6, after the sum $50, strike out the words "and such sum is hereby appropriated to reimburse the Pacific Railway Co." and insert "as reimbursement."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KELLER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SARAH GREEN, VIRGINIA GREEN, AND HENRY GREEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9615) for the relief of Sarah Green, Virginia Green, and Henry Green, next of kin of Lydia Rivers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sarah Green, Virginia Green, and Henry Green, next of kin of Lydia Rivers, the sum of $5,000 for killing of said Lydia Rivers by a United States Army truck on September 17, 1919.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 7, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the committee amendment is quite a substantial reduction for the death of a person. I am wondering upon what theory the committee reported on a death claim only $150, when we have just passed bills giving $5,000 for injuries and $2,500 for death.

Mr. GLYNN. I will say that this is not a case of dependents. While they are next of kin, they were not dependents. My recollection is that $150 covers the funeral expenses. It was not a case of dependent children.

Mr. WALSH. I think the committee should further have amended the bill, making it clear what the amount was for, instead of making it $150 for killing said Lydia Rivers. I think it should have stated that it was for funeral expenses.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

H. L. KOESTER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9614) for the relief of H. L. Koester.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, this is for the buildings that were destroyed in the same accident that was referred to in the last bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. For the damage to the buildings the committee allows $85, and for the death $150.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to H. L. Koester the sum of $85 for damages to his house, one Koester's Tenement, on the Meeting Street Road, about 3 miles from Charleston, S. C., by a United States Army truck on September 17, 1919.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HERBERT WARREN HARDMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6130) for the appointment of Warrant Officer Herbert Warren Hardman, captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a Senate bill on the calendar of the same tenor, and for that reason I object to the House bill.

JOHN M. GREEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1741) for the relief of John M. Green.

The SPEAKER. There is an identical Senate bill on the calendar, and the Chair will object.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 777) for the relief of John M. Green.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws John M. Green shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company G, Eighty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, on the 8th day of September, 1865: Provided, That no pension, bounty, or other allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill H. R. 1741 be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HERBERT WARREN HARDMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1880) providing for the appointment of Warrant Officer Herbert Warren Hardman as captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint Herbert Warren Hardman, formerly a major, Quartermaster Corps, a captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, to date from July 1, 1920, and to be placed on the promotion list in such place as is provided by section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920, for persons appointed as captains under the provisions of section 24 of said act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRAMTON). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 6130) of similar title was ordered to lie on the table.

MARIE DOUGHTY GORGAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3300) granting a pension to Marie Doughty Gorgas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as this involves a question of policy on the part of the Government which I consider too important to be taken up under unanimous consent, I object.

HENRY PETERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7583) for the relief of Henry Peters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Henry Peters, a citizen of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused to the derrick boat Pelican, property of the said Henry Peters, while in town of the United States Navy tug Barnett on July 2, 1918, may be sued for by the said Henry Peters in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Henry Peters, or against the said Henry Peters in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend on page 1, line 6, by striking out the word "town" and inserting the word "tow."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "town" and insert the word "tow."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

"MARY S. DOLBOW."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6177) for the relief of the owner of the fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said fishing smack and the U. S. S. N–1, on October 3, 1920, at 12.30 o'clock a. m., in the Delaware River Channel, off Tinicum Island, whereby she became a total loss, may be sued for by the owner of the said fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow in the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow, or against the owner of said fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TACOMA TUG & BARGE CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 966) for the relief of the Tacoma Tug & Barge Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Tacoma Tug & Barge Co., of Tacoma, Wash., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $674.22, to reimburse said company as owners of scow No. 8 for damages suffered by their boat as a result of a collision with the U. S. S. Goldsborough at Tacoma, Wash., December 17, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAJO TIMBER CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1945) to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of some member of the committee whether any of the forfeit money which was deposited by the Navajo Lumber & Timber Co., which is identic, as the report shows, with the Navajo Timber Co., the claimant in the bill under consideration, has been returned? Getting no response to the question, Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

HORACE E. WALKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6929) for the relief of Horace E. Walker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Horace E. Walker, of Suffolk County, the sum of $403, in full compensation for damages done to an automobile of the said Horace E. Walker, caused by negligence on the part of the employees of the United States in the operation of a mail truck owned and operated by the United States Government on January 6, 1920.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 11, strike out the figure "6" and insert the figure "5."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that No. 271 on the calendar, H. R. 11397, to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

FREDERICK MEARS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House Joint Resolution 316, authorizing the reappointment of Frederick Mears as a commissioned officer of the Regular Army, and making him available, when so reappointed, for service as chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskan Engineering Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the author of the resolution whether he would have any objection to a minor amendment in line 6, page 3, by inserting after the word "may" the word "thereafter"?

Mr. CURRY. I would have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 316) authorizing the reappointment of Frederick Mears as a commissioned officer of the Regular Army and making him available, when so reappointed, for service as chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskan Engineering Commission.

Whereas the Acting Comptroller General, in an opinion dated March 11, 1922, has held that by accepting appointments first as a member of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, and subsequently as chairman and chief engineer of said commission, and by exercising the functions of said civil office Frederick Mears, vacated, successively, his offices as first lieutenant, captain, major, and lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army, and that he is not at the present time an officer of the Regular Army: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reappoint Frederick Mears to the Regular Army in the grade and with the date of rank to which he would have been entitled at the time of such reappointment had he remained an officer of the Regular Army continuously from the time he first became an officer thereof: Provided, That after such reappointment said Frederick Mears shall be regarded as having in contemplation of law the same status, rights, and privileges as an officer of the Regular Army that he would have had if he had remained a commissioned officer of the Regular Army continuously, under the various commissions in the Regular Army, issued to and accepted by him from the date of his first appointment therein.

SEC. 2. That notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1222, 1224 (as amended by the act of February 28, 1877, 19 Stat., p. 243), 1763, 1764, and 1765, Revised Statutes, the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat., p. 205), and the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 10, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 120), as amended by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 582), or the provisions of other existing statutes of like import, the said Frederick Mears may, after having been reappointed an officer of the Regular Army under the provisions of the preceding section, continue in office under an existing commission as chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskan Engineering Commission or accept a new appointment as such, and may exercise the functions of said civil office without prejudice to his commission as an officer of the Regular Army or to his standing as such, and may receive the compensation duly prescribed from time to time for the incumbent of said civil office, less the pay and allowances to which he may be entitled as an officer of the Regular Army.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to make an inquiry. What is the function of the whereas clause to this bill? What good does that do?

Mr. CURRY. It does not do any good, except to explain to the House the reasons for the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the whereas clause on the first page.

The SPEAKER. That is ordinarily done after the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As a way of amending the title?

Mr. WALSH. No; it is a preamble.

The SPEAKER. The striking out of the preamble would naturally come after the third reading.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 3, line 6, after the word "may," insert "thereafter."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, after the word "may," insert the word "thereafter."

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is entirely necessary. Colonel Mears has not received his full salary since March He is not receiving the salary, allowance, and pay of a colonel of the United States Army. Now, if this word "hereafter" may prevent him from receiving that part of his salary as an Army officer held back since March it ought not to go in the bill. If it does not, then it would not do any harm in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my amendment was to preclude him from receiving any additional emoluments until the passage of the bill.

Mr. CURRY. He does not receive that now, and if the bill is passed with your amendment and he is reappointed he will probably not have his pay of colonel allowed until he is reappointed. He receives now $10,000 less his pay as a colonel. He does not receive the full amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it is the purpose of the gentleman that he should receive his full amount, to date back from April?

Mr. CURRY. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, I had a contrary view, thinking the gentleman desired only to have him get this additional pay from the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. CURRY. Of course, he did not seek this appointment, as he would rather be in the Engineer Corps of the Army. He thinks more of being an officer of the United States Army than we do of being Members of Congress, and he was assigned to this duty by the Secretary of War and the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior; but he did not ask for it. He obeyed orders and accepted it. I would object to an amendment going in that would stop that part of the salary to which he is entitled.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman want him to get the pay and allowance of this grade in the Army before he is reappointed?

Mr. CURRY. No——

Mr. WALSH. Then the pay and allowance should begin from the time he is reappointed. He can not be reappointed until this bill is passed.

Mr. CURRY. His salary is $10,000 a year as chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskan Engineering Commission and he received a salary as colonel in the Army. Now, he does not receive the full amount as chairman and engineer of the Alaskan Commission, but he receives $10,000 less his salary as colonel.

Mr. WALSH. What he gets as an Army officer?

Mr. CURRY. Yes. Now, he has not received anything as an Army officer since the Comptroller General has ruled that he automatically severed his connection with the Army. I do not believe that the Comptroller General's statement of the law is correct. The Comptroller General has autocratic power. His ruling is final. He can not be removed by the President; his acts can not be reviewed by the courts. He can only be removed by Congress on account of malfeasance in office or for gross incompetency, and he would have to be impeached to be removed that way. Of course, the only way to do justice to Colonel Mears is by act of Congress. We passed two acts of Congress thinking we had provided for the legal transfer of Colonel Mears at the request of the President, but the comptroller holds the legislation did not accomplish the object sought. I would not like to see him lose part of his salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not see how the suggested amendment will infringe his privileges. We are seeking to allow him to hold his civilian position at a salary of $10,000 a year without in any way involving his status as a military officer.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And with the privileges that will redound to that military position?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill does not have a retroactive effect?

Mr. CURRY. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my amendment is to clarify the carrying out of the intention of the bill.

Mr. CURRY. If it is the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that this amendment will not stop Colonel Mears from receiving the salary which is properly due him from March up to the time of his reappointment I have no objection to the amendment, but if it would have that effect I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin himself would want his amendment adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand it, Colonel Mears has been filling this position at an aggregate salary of $10,000?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the ruling of the comptroller is that he can not do so as long as he is holding a military position?

Mr. CURRY. Yes. The Comptroller General has ruled that by accepting the appointment of chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskian Engineering Commission Mr. Mears automatically vacated his commission in the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to embarrass the status of Colonel Mears in the receipt of the $10,000 salary as a civilian officer, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the engrossment of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the engrossed resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MARY ANN SHIPPING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11078) for the relief of the Mary Ann Shipping Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 to the Mary Ann Shipping Co., as compensation for and in full satisfaction of all claims of such company for any damages to the steamship Mary Ann sustained as a result of a collision between said steamboat and the United States tugboat Nahant on October 21, 1919, in the harbor of Ponta Delgada, Azores, the responsibility for such collision having been placed upon said United States tugboat Nahant by a naval board after investigation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STANDARD AMERICAN DREDGING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5475) for the relief of the Standard American Dredging Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the Standard American Dredging Co., owner of the dredge Long Beach and pipe line thereto attached, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,393.22, or so much thereof as may be necessary to fully reimburse said owner of said dredge and pipe line for damages suffered by its said dredge and pipe line as a result of a collision with the United States dredge Chinook, at Astoria, Oreg., May 1, 1916.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Line 7, strike out "$6,393.22" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,020.72."

Line 9, after the word "its," strike out the words "said dredge and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FITZCHARLES DRY GOODS CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8143) for the relief of the Fitzcharles Dry Goods Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Fitzcharles Dry Goods Co., of Trenton, N. J., the sum of $137, on account of damage to property by a Government-owned motor cycle.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

F. R. MESSENGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7662) for the relief of F. R. Messenger.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to F. R. Messenger, of Sedgwick County, Kans., the sum of $1,813.52 in full compensation for damages done to an automobile of the said F. R. Messenger, caused by the accidental coming loose of trailer from the Navy service truck No. 969, which was owned and driven by employees of the United States Government on December 30, 1920.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Line 7, after the word "of," strike out "$1,813.52" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500."

Line 8, after the word "Messenger," insert "and all damages resulting from a collision."

In line 9 strike out the word "accidental."

In line 11 strike out "which was" and after the word "owned" insert the word "by" and strike out the word "and."

In line 12 strike out "driven by employees of."

At the end of the line, after the word "Government," strike out the word "on," and on line 13 strike out "December 30, 1920" and insert "and driven by its employees."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HENRY CORDES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3291) for the relief of Henry Cordes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to deduct from the time required of Henry Cordes, of Fort Laramie, Wyo., to perfect title to a new homestead entry the time he spent in residence and cultivation upon homestead entry, Cheyenne, 027226, which was canceled because erroneously allowed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRANCES MACK MANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8244) permitting Frances Mack Mann to purchase certain public lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a case where the department is rather frank in expressing its opposition to the passage of the bill, and it seems to me the reasons they give are rather valid. I would like to know what the circumstances are.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, the department does not especially object to the passage of this bill, but it is following its usual policy of objecting to the passage of any bill.

Mr. WALSH. The department says that "for the reasons above given" it does not approve the passage of the bill H. R. 8244.

Mr. VAILE. Well, perhaps it is useless to argue the point as to whether they are opposing generally or only opposing this. And let me suggest to the gentleman that the report of the Department of Agriculture is not entirely accurate. In the first place, in regard to the timber the Department of the Interior reports the conditions as they are, and that varies materially from the statement of the Department of Agriculture. The Department of the Interior reports that the area is hilly, timber third rate, and most of it burned off. Now, there are various substantial reasons why this case should not fall within the usual rules of not approving sales of land within the forest reserves. Here is a case where the applicant for this relief purchased the land in good faith in 1907 from private parties, supposing it to be private land. The reason why a mistake was made was because of an inaccurate survey on the part of the Government. Having discovered that error, she made application under a statute which provides for exactly such cases, to enable people to purchase Government lands after a mistake was made in the survey, and that application was being acted upon favorably by the department; it was held up on account of a resurvey being desired. And the General Land Office advised the senior Senator from Colorado at that time when the survey was made that there would be no further delay. But after that time the land was withdrawn as a part of the forest reserves. She put much more than the ordinary amount of improvements upon it. It seems very harsh not to allow her to take this very small area.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know whether this ever was done before with this particular kind of land?

Mr. VAILE. Oh, yes. There have been a number of cases of that kind before the Public Lands Committee. In the great majority of these cases we do abide by the recommendation of the department.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, what is usually done is that the party is reimbursed for expenditures made upon the land when he is required to move off.

Mr. VAILE. Of course, that would be all right. But I am quite sure that the gentleman will find, if he consults the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, that that has been done a number of times.

Mr. WALSH. With that assurance, and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] privately has corroborated it, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; I will reserve my objection. This is a bill where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has withdrawn his objection, although the department has specifically refused to indorse the bill. A bill that I had up a short time ago was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, although the department specifically recommended its enactment on the ground of the equity involved therein.

Again the point is made by the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is new and never has been done before. That was expressly the state of affairs in the bill that I introduced for the benefit of Mr. Knowles. It has never been done before. There was no law for it, and it was brought in here on the basis of its equity and not because there was law for it. The committee indorsed it unanimously and the Department of State recommended the equity of it. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to confine my remarks to the bill under consideration, not to go back and review any ancient history of the proceedings of this day. What advantage will this claimant obtain over what she would obtain if she were granted the permittee's right under the forest reserve act?

Mr. VAILE. Well, people generally regard it as an advantage to own a house which they have built, especially when they build it at much more than the ordinary expense incurred by the average permittee on a forest reserve.

Mr. STAFFORD. But she is seeking to obtain title to other land in addition to that covered by the house.

Mr. VAILE. It is to protect the water supply of her house. The water supply is inadequate for this house and the other that she owns in connection with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report of the Acting Secretary of Agriculture shows that there are a good many lode claims and placer claims pending on this land, and that she also has some claims pending of that character.

Mr. VAILE. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. What advantage does it give to the owner of the land as against these entrymen under the lode claims laws and placer claims laws?

Mr. VAILE. If the gentleman will allow me, there are no mining claims of hers pending. She owns herself two patented claims. This house in question is located partly on one of those claims. If she did not own the land on which the rest of the house was located, she would be in a position of owning a house partly on her land and partly on other land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Her house would be on Government land under the forest reserve act.

Mr. VAILE. Partly on Government land and partly on her own land. I do not think the gentleman would want to own a house under those circumstances. Of course, the bill provides, as in all cases of the grant of the surface of mineral lands, that prospectors shall have the right to explore. The grant which the bill asks is to be subject to the reservation of minerals.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the acreage of this lot 12? Seventy-three acres?

Mr. VAILE. Seventy-three acres in the whole thing. There are several fractional lots.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many other persons have title to similar lots available for mining purposes?

Mr. VAILE. I understand none, except a few patented claims a mile or more away.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can I have the assurance of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] that the claimants under the lode and placer mining laws will not be embarrassed by granting to this woman title to this lot 12?

Mr. SINNOTT. All minerals are reserved.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not speaking about minerals reserved. I am inquiring whether these claimants for mineral rights will be embarrassed by reason of giving title to this woman?

Mr. SINNOTT. There will be no material embarrassment.

Mr. STAFFORD. What other embarrassment than material embarrassment would they have?

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not suppose they would be allowed to undermine her house, but they would have the right to prospect under this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. They would not either have the right to blow it up.

Mr. VAILE. These are all practically tungsten claims that have been abandoned for years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Frances Mack Mann be permitted to purchase lot 11, comprising 3.71 acres; lot 12, comprising 1.58 acres; lot 13, comprising 28.38 acres; lot 16, comprising 39.67 acres; all situate in the east half of the northwest quarter of section 6, township 2 south, range 72 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 73.33 acres, in the State of Colorado, at $1.50 per acre: Provided, That all coal and minerals contaned therein are hereby reserved to the United States. That said coal and minerals shall be for sale or disposal of the United States under the coal and minerals land laws, and entrymen shall have the right to enter upon said lands for the purpose of prospecting for and mining such deposits.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 1, strike out "$1.50" and insert in lieu thereof "$1.25," and on page 2, line 4, strike out the word "of" and insert the word "by."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VAILE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 26.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a commission is hereby created, consisting of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker, to investigate the needs of the office of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, and to report not later than December 20, 1922, (1) what quarters, equipment, and facilities are necessary properly to care for and protect all records and papers in such office, and (2) what additional personnel, if any, is required to perform the duties imposed by law upon such office—to the Committee on Rules.

JOHN PAUL DE BAAT DOELMAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to permit Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis at the expense of the Government of the Netherlands.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded by the Government of the Netherlands as an act of courtesy and that it would be in accordance with established precedents.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
June 15, 1922.

H. L. M'FARLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1087) for the relief of H. L. McFarlin.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in going over the report on this bill very carefully I find that in the amount fixed by the committee they have failed to allow for $2,000, the salvage value of the trucks that were used in the screen-wagon contract. I wish to inquire whether an amendment reducing the amount $2,000 would be acceptable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. EDMONDS. If it is acceptable to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY] it will be perfectly acceptable to me.

Mr. JACOWAY. That is for the trucks?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that understanding, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to H. L. McFarlin, of the county of Pulaski and State of Arkansas, the sum of $15,048.52, in full compensation for loss and damage suffered by the said H. L. McFarlin under his contract for transporting United States mail at Little Rock, Ark.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "pay," insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out "$15,048.52" and insert in lieu thereof "$13,048.52."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 7, strike out "$15,048.52" and insert in lieu thereof "$13,048.52."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JACOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES S. FRIES.

The next business on the private calendar was the bill (S. 2445) for the relief of Charles S. Fries.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, here is a claim that dates back to 1911, nearly 11 years ago. As time passes on, the claimant apparently believes he is entitled to a larger amount of damages. From the report at the time of the accident he was incapacitated for only three months, but as the years go on, with a later report, occasioned by the fresh recollections that come with the fading of memory, it seems that he was incapacitated for nine months, which is now the basis of this claim for $1,248. From my reading of the report I do not think this man is permanently incapacitated. True, the accident occurred in the House restaurant, and I am surprised that if he had a meritorious claim 11 years ago it has been slumbering all these years, until it has now got to be a rather large amount.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, this man has been permanently injured, because he walks with a cane and he is not able to use his leg properly. We thought possibly we would be justified in giving him a year's pay. If the gentleman is going to object, why, let him go ahead and object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall not object to a reasonable amount, but I have had experience with these private-claim bills. This brings to mind an employee of the House 16 years ago being very much invalided while his claim was pending. I must confess that he worked me. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] charged that he worked me when I persuaded him to withdraw his objection. Only a few weeks after the bill was passed the claimant suddenly got well. I think if this claimant gets this amount he will recover very quickly. It reminds me of the scene in Hoyt's Temperance Town, which I saw 20 years or more ago as a parody on the prohibition law in New Hampshire. When a bottle was produced from the hip everybody in the hotel got ill; but as soon as the contents were emptied the illness disappeared. So, as this man has received only an injury to his ankle, nothing serious, I think it is going pretty far to grant him $1,248, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

APPLICATION FOR ENTRY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business on the private calendar was the bill (H. R. 11355) validating a certain application for and entry of public lands.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent upon the entry hereinafter named, upon which proof of compliance with law has been filed, upon the payment of all moneys due thereon: Homestead entry, Alliance, Nebr., No. 018311, made by Theodore A. Crapsey, on January 21, 1918, for lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, section 3, township 29 north, range 42 west, sixth principal meridian.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALLOWING CREDITS TO ACCOUNTS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11528) to allow credits in the accounts of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

D. V. BUSSIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 8553, a bill for the relief of D. V. Bussie.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JOHN F. HOMEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 7322, a bill for the relief of John F. Homen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall be obliged to object to this bill; but before I object I think there should be a word of comment. There is not sufficient in the report to show the damages suffered by this man. The doctor's statement is that he might be up and about in five or six weeks. Here is a doctor's and a hospital bill amounting to $140, and he gets around finally to a claim of $2,000. On that unsupported claim the committee have recommended $2,000. It seems as though the committee should require something more than a mere claim.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman look at the number of injuries that this man suffered, which he will find in the report?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I have read that, and also at the bottom of page 7, where it says, "Mr. Homen will be disabled as the result of his injuries probably some five or six weeks, barring, of course, the condition in mandible"—whatever that is; perhaps the gentleman understands it. He also says "the condition, if not relieved by operation, is likely to give considerable trouble in the future." On the following page is a bill for about $140. You will also notice in the report is a report of the Secretary of War, and in view of the things that have been stated here this morning I am sure he is particularly a high authority. The Secretary of War says "the evidence included in the report of investigation in the case show Mr. Homen's personal injuries were of a serious nature, but I am unable to state whether or not he has suffered permanent and lasting injury."

I think I shall be obliged to object, without further information.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection until the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] explains?

Mr. WURZBACH. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the affidavit on the last page of the report of F. A. Allen, wherein he states that Mr. Homen is permanently injured by reason of the above accident.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; the report of Doctor Steineuinder is three months later than the affidavit the gentleman refers to, but the one of Doctor Allen of August 18 is highly indefinite.

Mr. WURZBACH. I want to say that this man was in the hospital and on crutches for 9 or 10 months.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not found the evidence of that. I think the amount allowed by the committee is excessive. If the evidence is available as the gentleman states an allowance of $1,000 might be considered reasonable.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman from Michigan read the statement of Doctor Steineuinder?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have quoted it twice in my remarks.

Mr. KNUTSON. Then I do not see how the gentleman can come to the conclusion that he does.

Mr. WURZBACH. The affidavit of Doctor Steineuinder was made July 19, 1919, and that was only 15 days after the injury.

Mr. CRAMTON. I was incorrect as to the date. But even the statement in 1921 is vague generalities, and unless we can have something more definite I will object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

VINCENT L. KEATING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9944) for the relief of Vincent L. Keating.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $385.32 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing Vincent L. Keating for money belonging to the United States and stolen while in his custody, the said Vincent L. Keating having made good the loss to the United States out of his own funds.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and in place thereof insert: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Vincent L. Keating the sum of $385.32, representing public funds for which he was accountable, which were stolen while in his custody on or about June 7, 1918, and refunded to the United States to make good the loss of these public funds."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES MARTIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10047) for the relief of Frances Martin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

J. IRVING BROOKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 367) for the relief of J. Irving Brooks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to J. Irving Brooks, of Essex County, Va., the sum of $100, in full compensation for damages done to an automobile of the said J. Irving Brooks, caused by negligence on the part of the employees of the United States in the operation of a mail truck owned and operated by the United States Government on December 30, 1919.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 7, strike out the figures "$100" and insert in lieu thereof "$35."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LOUIS CAYET.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10544) for the relief of Louis Cayet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Louis Cayet the sum of $1,085 for injuries sustained by him when his motor cycle collided with a mail truck in Cleveland, Ohio, August 20, 1920.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out "$1,085" and insert "$585."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. PHILBRICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 745) for the relief of William H. Philbrick.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to William H. Philbrick, city marshal of Keene, N. H., the sum of $41.34 in full for expenses incurred in returning Pvt. Donald Merchant, a member of the United States Army, to Fort McKinley, Me., on or about October 10, 1918, upon request of United States Army officer in the personnel of said Fort McKinley.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

D. V. BUSSIE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I asked unanimous consent to have passed over the bill H. R. 8553, for the relief of D. V. Bussie, because at that moment the author of the bill was absent from the Chamber. He is now here, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8553, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have had some discussion with the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I understand that he is agreeable to a modification of the amount. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to D. V. Bussie the sum of $2,000 on account of injury sustained by the said D. V. Bussie when struck by a United States mail truck as he was crossing Normal Boulevard at Sixty-first Street, in the city of Chicago, Ill., on the 17th day of April, 1921.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 4, after the word "pay," insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 5, by striking out "$2,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Line 5, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPROUL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CAPT. J. S. CARPENTER, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8219) to adjust accounts of Capt. J. S. Carpenter, Supply Corps, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be recommitted to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS TO MUSCATINE COUNTY, IOWA.

The next business on the calendar was the bill (H. R. 11233) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey certain lands to the county of Muscatine, Iowa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey to the county of Muscatine, Iowa, the following-described land, now a part of the biological station at Fairport, Iowa: A corner of land in the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 77, range 1 east, described as follows: Beginning at a point on the southerly line of a 66-foot public road, as now located, where said southerly line intersects the westerly boundary of tract owned by the United States of America; thence south 19 degrees 30 minutes east along said westerly boundary of said tract a distance of 56 feet; thence north 36 degrees 30 minutes east a distance of 174 feet; thence south 55 degrees west a distance of 150 feet to point of beginning, containing ninety-two one-thousandths of an acre: Provided, That the land authorized to be conveyed hereunder shall be used for the construction of and be maintained as a public highway free of any expense to the United States, and all work thereon shall be such as not to interfere with the operations and efficiency of the biological station and in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of Commerce: Provided further, That in the event of the discontinuance by the county of Muscatine of the use of the above-described property as a public highway or the failure to maintain same in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of Commerce the title to said land shall revert to the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "seventy-seven" insert the word "north."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "east" insert the words "fifth principal meridian."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—SHIP SUBSIDY LEGISLATION.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there has just been filed the majority report upon the bill H. R. 12021, the ship subsidy bill, and I ask unanimous consent that those wishing to file minority views may have five legislative days within which to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that those wishing to file minority views upon the bill referred to may have five legislative days within which to do it. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the ship subsidy bill?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes. I understand the majority has just filed their report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose the gentleman has no objection to having it provided that this shall not interfere with the consideration of the measure.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There is no objection to it by the members of the majority on the committee.

Mr. WALSH. There may be no objection, but ordinarily if a minority report is not filed under this permission, the point could be raised and it might interfere with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman means before the expiration of the five days?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I understand that we are given five days within which to file our views, and I know that the majority do not think or wish to call up the bill for action before the expiration of that time, else they would not be willing to grant the five days.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I do not know anything about what the idea of the committee is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts give us some idea of when it will be called up? Will it be before the five days have elapsed?

Mr. WALSH. We are going to have a session to-morrow; it might make its appearance to-morrow for all I know.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not think the gentleman would want to push a bill, filed to-day, and the majority report filed to-day, and the bill introduced yesterday, especially a bill of this kind——

Mr. MONDELL. Five legislative days carries it until next Thursday.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not know how long it will be, but I have provided for five legislative days, and it is a very customary request, and certainly on a bill of this importance that time ought to be granted, as no more important bill has been presented.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know if the gentleman has any objection to having that understanding, that if he is given this permission it shall not interfere with the consideration of the bill. If he does object to that, I shall object to filing the report.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will ask it, subject to that objection, although I think it is ungracious under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts again, does he think it will probably come up to-morrow? I think he said something about it.

Mr. WALSH. I said for all I knew it might make its appearance to-morrow, but I do not know very much about it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I imagine the gentleman acted on the spur of the moment. Now, the committee in charge of the bill has no objection to the granting of permission unconditionally for five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BILLS ON THE TABLE.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bills H. R. 9101, 9202, 9051, and 9201 be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. DENISON. They having been embodied in a bill which was passed by the House on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the bills referred to be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS IN ORDER TO-MORROW.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be considered to-morrow, only unobjected bills to be considered, from the point where we terminate to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the call of the Private Calendar be continued to-morrow from where it concludes to-day, only unobjected bills to be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, has the call of the Private Calendar now been suspended for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin made the point of no quorum and withdrew it temporarily.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have been waiting all day——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 17, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Dial	Kellogg	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kendrick	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	King	Phipps	Warren
Fernald	Ladd	Poindexter	Willis

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent by reason of illness. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it shall take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ALASKA FUR-SEAL SKINS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting in response to Senate Resolution 287, agreed to May 27, 1922, information relative to sales of Alaska fur-seal skins under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I have been requested by a number of Rhode Island women to present the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask that it may be read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That we protest against the food, tableware, and women's wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill. These schedules will increase the cost of living in every American home. They are fines levied by American men upon American women and upon American children. They should not be allowed to become a law.

This resolution is submitted by the following-named Rhode Island women:

Sara M. Algoe, chairman Providence League of Women Voters.
Marguerite H. Foster, secretary Providence Housewives' League.
Nannie B. Gibson, president Housewives' League.
Avis A. Hawkins, director of thrift, Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs; director and membership chairman, United League of Women Voters.
Alice W. Hunt.
Annette B. Thayer.
Bertha Hatton Smith, vice president Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLT presented the petition of Edward E. Peterson and 82 other citizens of Providence, R. I., praying for the prompt passage of an adequate tariff law based upon American valuations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Battle Creek, Mich., praying that only a moderate duty be imposed on kid gloves in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorials of Haas Bros., of Cincinnati, and Riddle Graff & Co., of Delaware, both in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the imposition in the pending tariff bill of a higher rate of duty on wrapper tobacco than $1.85 per pound, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Ottawa (Kans.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the prompt acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, including the Gorgas plant, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McCUMBER presented a petition of officers and members of the Ebenezer Danish Evangelical Lutheran Congregation of Flaxton, N. Dak., praying for the granting of relief to the suffering peoples of Armenia and protesting against Turkish sovereignty in that country, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the secretary of the bar association of my State in reference to certain legislation. I have had a great many telegrams of similar character from different places in the Union. I simply ask that this be printed in the RECORD as a sample and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., June 17, 1922.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Following resolution unanimously adopted by Wyoming State Bar Association:

"Resolved, That it is the belief and sense of the Wyoming State Bar Association that owing to the congested condition of the trial dockets in the several United States district courts relief should be afforded by the prompt appointment of additional United States district judges as recommended by the American Bar Association, and that the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States should speedily agree upon and pass a bill authorizing the appointment by the President of such additional judges.

CLYDE M. WATTS, Secretary.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 3723) granting an increase of pension to Catherine Degnan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 3724) granting a pension to George W. Wise (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3725) granting a pension to Thomas Frostad (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3726) granting a pension to Henry H. Forsyth (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3727) to authorize the War Finance Corporation to make advances to cooperative grain-elevator associations; to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 212) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate rates, fares, charges, etc., of common carriers in the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of discussion in committee and some in the Senate with reference to Muscle Shoals. As a member of the committee which went down to visit Muscle Shoals I have been very much interested in the matter and very much interested in the development of the project. I have also been very glad to see that there has been no propaganda of any kind in connection with the offers of any of the different men who have made offers.

I have here a letter, dated June 10, 1922, signed by Mr. James B. Smith, president of the Mississippi Valley Association. I desire to read a part of the letter:

Muscle Shoals is in the Mississippi Valley. We believe it is one of the valley's greatest assets.

We believe its completion and operation under the plans submitted by Mr. Ford and backed by Mr. Edison will do more to assist in the development of our valley's resources and bring greater and more beneficial results to our valley territory than any one thing that can possibly be done at this time.

If you agree with these views, and if you want the people of the Mississippi Valley to receive the great benefits from the working out of the plans of two of the greatest master minds our country has produced, we then ask you to take the following prompt action.

I may say in this connection that Mr. Edison came before the committee and testified that he had made no investigation in particular, that he had gone down to Muscle Shoals in Mr. Ford's private car, and had been asked by Mr. Ford to look around over the territory for a distance of 100 miles and see if he could find any satisfactory minerals there.

The bill will be up in Congress within a few days and prompt action is necessary.

If the votes of the Mississippi Valley Senators and Congressmen can be obtained, Mr. Ford's great proposed enterprise can be secured for the Mississippi Valley, a consummation well worth working for.

Please wire or write a strong letter and send it under a special-delivery stamp to both of your Senators and to your Congressmen, urging them to vote for the acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer, with the Gorgas power plant included, and tell them why you think they should do so.

Hoping that you will act promptly in response to this request, and that you will send us copies of the telegrams or letters which you will send, so that we may check up on the Members of Congress and the Senate who will not have been solicited and reach them through another source, and thanking you for your cooperation, we are,

Very sincerely yours,

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ASSOCIATION,
JAS. E. SMITH, President.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator where Mr. Smith lives?

Mr. McKINLEY. He lives in St. Louis. This letter was sent to a commercial association in South Dakota.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words. There is no one in the Senate, I think, who is more opposed to machine-made legislation than I am, and although I believe thoroughly that the American citizen should express his views to the two Houses of Congress I have always deplored that class of propaganda which is issued by organizations asking kindly people to reflect the views of some organization, rather than their own views, back on their Senators and Representatives. But in reference to this particular matter I think there has been as little propaganda as on any great question that has come before the Congress.

There is reason, and very good reason, for immediate action in reference to the Muscle Shoals program. It has been undertaken by the Government. It has been undertaken in compliance with existing law. Since the present administration came into power the progress of the work was stopped because the funds were withheld. That is no fault of the Senate of the United States, because the Senate has passed bills providing the money to complete the dam, and also in the closing hours of the last Congress it passed a bill for the working of the nitrate plant. Recently the Senate has provided the money for the continuance of the work on the dam. So I am not saying anything in criticism of my colleagues in this regard; but I wish it to be understood as a matter of record that the proposal for these plants to be operated under private control did not come from Congress; it has come from the executive branch of the Government.

The Secretary of War, who has charge of these matters, not favoring Government operation, more than a year ago suggested that the proper way to operate these plants was to dispose of them to private enterprise and call for bids from citizens of the United States looking to the completion of the dam at Muscle Shoals and the operation of the nitrate plant there. In conformity with that proposal coming from the administration which is now in power, Mr. Ford made a proposition to the Government of the United States, and that proposition has been submitted to Congress. I think it is nothing but fair, nothing but just, and nothing but reasonable, when the Government itself invites bids and asks citizens of the United States to make proposals in reference to the great project, the work on which is now lying idle and the people getting no benefit from it, that Congress, when the matter is submitted to it for consideration, should consider it fairly and justly and not pigeonhole it.

I myself am in favor of the Ford proposal, because I believe that Mr. Ford, with his organizing ability, is more capable of carrying out the intent of the original legislation to furnish agriculture in America with cheaper fertilizer than is any other man in America of whom I know. I am not, however, discussing the case from my viewpoint, although whenever I get an opportunity to vote for it I shall vote for the Ford proposal.

As to Mr. Smith, he is a distinguished citizen of the United States. He is no mere propagandist; he is not representing a body organized in this country for selfish purposes, but is the president of a great organization in the Mississippi Valley whose object is the improvement of its waterways, with the unselfish desire of furnishing proper transportation to the people in the Mississippi Valley; and what he says in reference to this matter should not be regarded in a captious way.

Mr. Smith is one of the most representative citizens of America; and the men who stand behind him in this organization do not divide along political lines; they belong to both of the great political parties; they are the representative business men of America. When they express their opinion with regard to this matter, that opinion is entitled to courteous and fair consideration. What they say represents the reflected views of the very best men we have between the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains.

I wish also to say that, regardless of what other decision may be made, I am in entire accord with the views expressed by Mr. Smith, the president of the Mississippi Valley Association, in reference to the Ford proposals; but, whether we may agree with Mr. Smith or not, as this proposal came from the Government and from the administration, it is entitled to courteous consideration, and to consideration that will not kill the proposal by delay. The matter should be considered on its merits before the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not wish at this time to engage in a discussion of the Muscle Shoals project, or the bid of Mr. Ford in reference thereto, or the bid of any other person, but I think there ought to be merely a word said in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama following the reading of the letter of Mr. Smith. There is undoubtedly a great propaganda in reference to this matter, and this letter is a part of it. The letter shows on its face that it is propaganda. I mention that only as a fact. I could not stop the propaganda if I would, and I would not stop it if I could. This is a free country, and anybody who wishes to propagandize may do so. My own private opinion is that Mr. Smith, whose letter the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY] has read, does not know what he is talking about. He is entirely mistaken, in my judgment, but he has a perfect right, of course, to his opinion, and a perfect right to try to get all the associations and organizations of all kinds throughout the country to write to their Representatives and Senators.

When the time comes, I am going to discuss the matter fully and in detail. I am not now charging that Mr. Smith or those acting with him are to blame for this propaganda. So far as the hearings before the Agricultural Committee are concerned, not only Mr. Ford, but every other person or corporation who has ever made a proposal in reference to the Muscle Shoals project has, I think, acted in good faith. They have presented their ideas in a very gentlemanly and courteous way and have not, so far as I know, undertaken to take advantage of the Committee on Agriculture or of Congress or of anyone else.

There are a great many other people outside of these bidders who are interested in this project, and who are moved by various incentives, some of them from purely financial considerations, such as real estate agents and speculators who expect to make millions out of it. Others, moved by the very highest motives, think there is an opportunity to secure fertilizer cheaply; others are moved by the desire to have the river developed, having in mind principally navigation considerations. Some are actuated by other considerations; but I only want to say in passing that if Mr. Ford's offer which Mr. Smith advocates should be accepted it will not result in the improvement of the Mississippi Valley as he suggests. It will be more of a local improvement, and will be great in its way. However, whether that view be taken or any other view, it is worthy of the consideration of all honest-minded men.

I know that it is a common thing to charge that a propaganda is on. Mr. Smith says in a letter that there is a propaganda to prevent Mr. Ford developing Muscle Shoals. I think that probably most of the propaganda reaches me, not because I am of any importance but because it so happens that I am chairman of the committee which is considering the subject, and I want to say frankly that the evidences of propaganda that have reached me show that 99 per cent of it is in favor of the acceptance of Mr. Ford's proposal. I only mention that as a fact, and not as a criticism. It may be its authors are right; at least, they are doing what they have a right to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have known the Senator for many years, and I have never known him to be controlled by outside influences. He is one man upon whom I have always felt I could rely; that he would decide a question for himself. The Senator does not think that the propaganda that is in circulation is going to influence his judgment nor that of the committee, does he?

Mr. NORRIS. I can speak only for myself, but I certainly say that I do not think it is going to influence me. I am not charging that it is going to influence anybody else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not a question as to whether or not there is propaganda going on; that is a side issue. I do not think there is much propaganda; certainly there is comparatively little in comparison with the propaganda that is carried on as to many other matters of this kind. However, the gravamen of the letter submitted by Mr. Smith is that there should be action by Congress; that this proposal should be either accepted or rejected, and I rose to ask the Senator if he does not agree that we should act before this session of Congress adjourns.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree absolutely with that proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Agriculture unanimously took the action, which the Senate approved, in reporting an appropriation of $7,500,000 to complete the dam. It would be a governmental and moral crime to stop work on it. As to what we are going to do with the Muscle Shoals or what the permanent policy is I should like to settle to-day. I would be glad, indeed, to have it settled at this session of Congress; but I have said not only to Mr. Ford's representatives but to everybody else that, in my judgment, while I would myself be willing to vote to take it up and displace the tariff bill—a bill of which I am not in favor—I realize that can not be done. I realize that that is an impossibility, and I have said always to them that we might just as well face the facts, though I am sorry they are as we find them. I do not believe that with the business before the Senate and the other branch of Congress that there is a possibility during this session of Congress of settling what the permanent policy toward Muscle Shoals shall be. I have reached that conclusion not because I want to but because it seems to me that the facts before us are so impelling that no man who will consider it can reach any other conclusion.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKINLEY. Is it not a fact that the Senate has passed the appropriation, which the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate unanimously recommended, of seven and a half million dollars, which ultimately will be increased to $23,000,000, the seven and a half million dollars covering the work involved in the completion of Dam No. 2?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a moment, of course I said in my remarks a few moments ago that I did not hold the Senate responsible for any delay, because the Senate has not caused any delay in this matter up to this time. I think the Senate is to be commended, and that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, headed by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, must be commended in the highest terms for proposing the appropriation to carry on and complete the dam; but, of course, the American people want more than the dam finished. They want a resultant product from this great investment of the United States Government.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that of course we can not set aside the pending tariff bill. We have not the votes to do it. We have not the strength to do it. That is a great governmental bill; but a time will come between the passage of the tariff bill and the report of a conference committee, after the bill has gone to conference, when the Senate will have time to act; and I have been hopeful that the Senator from Nebraska would try to make a report here, so that the Senate in that intervening time might have an opportunity to consider it and fix the policy of the Government, whatever it is going to be.

Of course, I think the Ford proposal should be adopted; but if we are not going to adopt it Mr. Ford is entitled to know it, and so are the people of America, and so is the Government, and some fixed policy should be determined on. A time will come before adjournment when I believe there will be an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. NORRIS. If there ever comes a time in this session of Congress when that can be done, when it is a physical possibility to do it, the Senator from Alabama will find me trying to do it. I do not believe the time is coming in this session. When this tariff bill is through it will be, I think, a great deal later than it is now; and there are other bills that I presume there will be an attempt, at least, to take up here that will take a great deal of time.

I do not see any use in trying to deceive ourselves as to the condition. I may be wrong. I hope I am. I have said so. I have said in substance to Mr. Ford's representatives, no longer ago than yesterday, what I have said to-day on the floor of the Senate. You will find, I think, if you will investigate, that no corporation, no individual, that has had any offer in regard to Muscle Shoals pending before the committee will say other than that the committee has acted with all the expedition possible. They have all been treated, I think they will say, with absolute fairness, regardless of the individual views of any member of the committee. That, in substance, was said to me by the chief engineer of Mr. Ford's own company no longer ago than yesterday.

Mr. President, we know that we are approaching a campaign. We know that all the Members of the House will be anxious to go away, and that practically a third of the Members of the Senate will be engaged in that campaign. We know that it is announced that we are to pass a ship subsidy bill—another bill that I am not in favor of. I would rather take up the Muscle Shoals proposition than that. I would vote to do it if we stood any show of doing it. We have the bonus bill to consider; and the result is going to be, as everybody knows, I think, that when we get through with the things that are going to be before us it is going to run away up into the campaign, when it will be a physical impossibility to keep men here.

I realize that there is great difference of opinion as to what the permanent policy of the Government should be at Muscle Shoals. That difference of opinion exists not only in the Senate but in the House as well. It is a debatable question. I have my definite ideas; I know what I would like to do; but I realize that there are many Members of the Senate and of the House who do not agree with me, who are just as earnest and honest in their convictions as I am, and we are up against a question that is going to be very sharply debated, I presume, for some considerable length of time. Taking it all into consideration, it does not look to me as though we are going to be able to consider it at this session.

THE WORK CURE.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have practiced and preached working all my life, but I have become a little bit discouraged until to-day. I find, however, an editorial in the Washington Post on page 6 which encourages me greatly. It is very short, and I will read just a few lines from it, and ask that the rest of it be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The heading is:

The work cure.

That sounds mighty good.

In his address to the State Charities Aid Association in New York City recently Dr. John W. Brannan, president of the board of trustees of Bellevue and allied hospitals, stated that the use of work as a therapeutic agent is steadily increasing in the institutions under his direction and that the results have proved very satisfactory. He said that in many cases where the "work cure" was resorted to the patients were enabled to leave the hospitals after the lapse of two-thirds of the time ordinarily allotted to their cure.

Mr. President, I want to say that I do not know Doctor Brannan, and I am not an advertising agent for him; but I want to recommend this prescription to anyone in the United States who may be feeling badly, or whose health is a little undermined.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, does the Senator apply the same thing to Congress?

Mr. DIAL. No; Congress works hard now.

Mr. ASHURST. Works whom?

Mr. DIAL. Works its own Members hard. I do not know anybody in the world that works harder than Senators. Why, here under this infernal daylight-saving foolishness I get up early and I rush down and get a little hot breakfast, and I rush down through the departments, and I answer about 50 to 75 letters, and I come over here and listen to eloquent speeches from 11 o'clock to 6, faithfully.

Mr. President, this is a wonderful prescription. It is the best thing I have read in the papers in many years. I want the rest of it inserted as a part of my remarks.

I want to say to those who have felt a little bad, try it. Let us realize that the Government has not 15 cents except what it takes from the people by taxation or by selling our joint notes—bonds—to get it.

Mr. President, I believe it was the Scotch playwright, Barrie, who said that if there was any better fun than work God had failed to reveal it to him. I want to commend that sentiment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

THE WORK CURE.

In his address to the State Charities Aid Association in New York City recently Dr. John W. Brannan, president of the board of trustees of Bellevue and allied hospitals, stated that the use of work as a therapeutic agent is steadily increasing in the institutions under his direction and that the results have proved very satisfactory. He said that in many cases where the "work cure" was resorted to the patients were enabled to leave the hospitals after the lapse of two-thirds of the time ordinarily allotted to their cure.

Doctor Brannan is at the head of the largest combined hospital system in the world, and has devoted more than a quarter of a century to the development of Bellevue to its present leadership. His opinion on all matters connected with the cure and prevention of disease is considered of great value by members of his profession, and, naturally, his report on this departure in hospital practice was read with great interest. He rates the introduction of the system as the most important hospital development since the introduction of social-service groups more than 15 years ago.

By keeping the minds and hands of the patients occupied the doctor asserts that not only are long hours shortened but that cures are actually hastened.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

On page 49, after line 9, I move to insert the following:

Naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va.: Repairs to north breakwater, $200,000, to be immediately available.

I hope the chairman will accept that amendment, and I want to describe the situation there.

There are about 30 submarines there to be taken care of, and this breakwater was constructed to take care of the submarines that are moored there. These submarines are worth certainly $50,000,000. Last winter, on account of the severe storms, this breakwater was nearly destroyed. The department has been very urgent about repairing it, and says that these submarines can not be protected unless this breakwater is repaired. There is practically no other place to take the submarines, and the loss of one submarine, costing $1,500,000 to $2,000,000, would amount to a great deal more than this will cost—seven or eight times what it will cost.

Since the bill was reported the department officials have become very urgent. They have come here and said that it is utterly impossible for them to take care of these submarines unless the breakwater is repaired. They are anxious to have the money immediately available, so that they can repair it before the winter comes, with its storms.

I should like to have the chairman accept this amendment and take it into conference. If there is any doubt about it, I will not insist on it, because my responsibility about this matter is no greater than that of any other Senator; but I have looked into it and I know that it is very urgent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 49, after line 9, it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

Naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va.: Repairs to north breakwater, $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia just where this breakwater is located. I am more or less familiar with Hampton Roads and with Norfolk Harbor, and I should like the Senator to describe the location of the breakwater.

Mr. SWANSON. It is where they moor the submarines that are not in commission.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say, exactly where is it located?

Mr. SWANSON. It is located out on the water there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course it is located on the water, but whereabouts on the water?

Mr. SWANSON. North of the base.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, how much is this—$200,000?

Mr. SWANSON. To repair the breakwater; yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. To add to the $100,000,000 that has already been invested?

Mr. SWANSON. I am not replying to that now. That is not before us. If the Senator wants the submarines to be destroyed, he can vote that way. The department say they can not take care of those 30 submarines this winter unless this breakwater is repaired. Unless it is repaired it will be blown down and they will be absolutely helpless, and it will cost more money later. If the Senator on examination finds it is not right, he can have it rejected in conference; but I am satisfied that an examination will show that it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My question was asked in entire good faith. I was merely trying to get a clear conception of just where this breakwater is located. If the Senator will permit me to say so, it may be that we can arrive at some conclusion to let this matter go to conference; but I want to say that if money is provided for building another breakwater there, I hope the Senator from Virginia will exercise his influence to see that a breakwater is built that does not have to be rebuilt every few years.

Mr. SWANSON. There was a mistake made. Enough money was appropriated, but the storms last winter were more severe than they ever have been before, and the department says that unless this breakwater is repaired now the entire breakwater, which cost a great deal of money, will be destroyed. Of course, I can not exercise any control over the engineers. They ought to have constructed a stronger breakwater. They ought to have taken into consideration the possibility of these storms.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have always thought of Hampton Roads as a safe harbor that did not need breakwaters, one of the greatest harbors in the world, and that is the reason why I asked the Senator for the exact location of this breakwater. I can scarcely understand why shelter can not be found in Hampton Roads, or in some of the great estuaries of Hampton Roads, where submarines can be safe without the necessity of making an artificial harbor by breakwater.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator must know that when you have ships that are not under steam but are simply moored for preservation a breakwater is necessary, or the least waves will more or less injure them and injure the machinery. Consequently, they have to be in absolutely still water. The officials of the department have come down here; Admiral Gregory came down to-day and yesterday, and said that this was absolutely indispensable, or else those 30 submarines could not be taken care of this winter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is true that the department——

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator will recall that he appeared and urged it most strongly before both the Senate committee and the House committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will give me an opportunity, I was just about to call attention to the fact that the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Admiral Gregory, did appear before the committee and went into some detail in his representations in behalf of this appropriation and was exceedingly urgent that it was absolutely necessary to preserve the establishment there; that if it was not made, he said, it would entail later on much larger expense.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is perhaps not exactly germane, but may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill how many submarines we have now, and how many we are building?

Mr. POINDEXTER. We are building 42, and we will have 103 altogether when they are completed.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know how many Japan has or how many she is building?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will furnish the Senator that information in a few moments.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit a vote on my amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to having a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia if we can vote immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to offer an amendment? I am sure it will not lead to debate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill, on page 66, after the word "otherwise," in line 14. This amendment is one which I have shown to the acting chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Idaho proposes to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That all orders or contracts for work or material, under authorization of law heretofore or hereafter placed with Government-owned establishments, shall be considered as obligations in the same manner as provided for similar orders or contracts placed with private contractors, and appropriations for such work or material shall remain available for payment therefor as in the case of orders or contracts placed with private contractors.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment will have the effect, and no more, of placing the Government in the same relation to the appropriations when it does the work, as when a private contractor does it. When a bid is taken up by a private contractor the appropriation follows that contract; you may use it at any time. If the Government does the work, the appropriation fails with that particular year, and the work can not be completed if the contract is not finished. It simply places the private contract work and the Government work on an equality with reference to the appropriations in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This matter has been presented in previous years, and I believe it has some merit. The effect of it is to enable a yard to make a contract for work in a yard extending over a year. Under the existing law, if the year expires before the work is finished, the work has to be stopped. I believe it would be in the interest of the more efficient and more economical conduct of such work as is given to yards if we would make whatever appropriation is allowed to the yards a continuing appropriation until the work is completed. I shall be very glad to have the amendment adopted, and let it be considered in conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, we have been told, and truly, that agriculture is the cornerstone upon which all other industries rest. I want to supplement briefly what my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said about the Muscle Shoals project.

I hold in my hand an article from the Florence Times, a newspaper published in the county where the Muscle Shoals Dam is located. It deals with the question of fertilizer, and reads:

EXPOSURE OF FERTILIZER SALE PLANS—COUNTY AGENT DEAL SHOWS UP METHOD OF IMPOSITION UPON FARMERS—112 PER CENT CHARGED THEM—ACTUAL CONTRACT THAT NEARLY 500 LAUDERDALE FARMERS HAVE SIGNED IS REPRODUCED.

First. Following is a note or mortgage that came into my hands, and which hundreds of farmers in this county have had to sign in order to get fertilizers for this year's crops. Please note the undue stringency and injustice of it.

INTEREST-BEARING NOTE.

ALABAMA, 1922.

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Lauderdale County.

R. F. D.

On or before the 1st day of October next I, we, or either of us, jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of (company's name furnished on request) the sum of ——— dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from May 1 of the year this note bears date, until paid, for value received, in fertilizers. This note with annexed agreements forming one contract. It is agreed that I purchased, received, and used said fertilizers without any warranty whatever on the part of the seller save only that the analysis is true and correct as printed upon each bag, and I admit that the said fertilizers have been inspected, tagged, and branded in accordance with the laws of this State, and no failure of consideration shall be pleaded by me in any action on this note. Further, it is expressly understood and agreed that the seller has neither expressly nor impliedly warranted the effects of said fertilizers on crops, and that I can not hold the said company responsible in any way for practical results. And to further secure the payment of the above sum, and all recording expenses, and all other debts I or we now or may owe payee before the surrender of this note, I or we mortgage to payee the following unencumbered property, to wit, ——— my entire crops and rents of corn, cotton, and other produce for this year and each succeeding year until the same is paid, and I empower payee to take possession of said property whenever it elects to do so, and if, when any part of this indebtedness falls due, it is not paid, to sell said property at public sale after 10 days notice by posting at the courthouse door. The proceeds it will apply to any indebtedness whether due or not, and payee is authorized to purchase at said sale. If not paid at maturity, I agree to pay a reasonable attorney's fee and all other expenses for collecting or adjusting same. The makers and indorsers hereof waive all rights of exemption under laws of this and all other States.

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of ———.

Witness my hand and seal this day and year above written.

Commenting upon that contract the county agent, Mr. Deal, says:

You will observe that it could fairly take the shirt off the signer's back, and everything except his wife and child and hope of heaven. Also note that the company may take possession of his crops or property under this mortgage at any time, even one day after signing. It only requires close reading to appreciate the dastardly unreasonableness of its requirements.

And, second, the farmer is paying approximately 110 per cent for the privilege of signing. Note the following: Evidently in order to be in line with farm bureau prices, which handles fertilizer materials for cash only, the cost price, for instance, on acid phosphate was set at $13 per ton; but the credit price is $18.50. This means a charge of $1.10 per month for the five months that the note is made for. This might be considered interest No. 1, and on annual basis would mean $13.20, or 101½ per cent interest on a principal of $13. Then, in addition, a regular 8 per cent per annum charge is made, not on the first or cash price but on the $18.50 price, resulting in a total interest charge of one hundred and twelve and a fraction per cent per annum.

Mr. President, that is why the farmers of America are asking that the Ford offer be accepted. That is why the farm organizations in the North, in the West, and in the South are asking that the Ford offer be accepted. They are seeking to be delivered from the merciless greed of the Fertilizer Trusts of the United States. Here is the practical and concrete evidence of such a cruel and monstrous trust.

What does Henry Ford propose to do? He proposes to manufacture fertilizer, and his chief engineer, who spoke for him before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the Senate hearings, said that he proposes to make fertilizer and sell it to the farmer at half the price the farmer is paying for it to-day. Is there any wonder, then, that there is a propaganda on the part of the poor, downcast, and oppressed farmers of the United States?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am greatly interested in the statement of the Senator from Alabama that Mr. Ford's representative said that he would sell fertilizer at one-half the price for which the so-called trust is selling it. I want to know when that statement was made and what guaranty there is of that sale to the farmer.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Ford in his contract proposes to charge not over 8 per cent profit above the cost of production, and Mr. Mayo made that statement in the hearings before the Senate committee, early in his testimony. He said that it was his purpose to produce fertilizer, he contracted to do it, and I asked him about what price it would sell for, and he said about half the price they now have to pay for it. That is the statement of Mr. Mayo.

Mr. McNARY. I want to ask the Senator if that referred to the production of organic fertilizer or chemical fertilizer, and did it contemplate a complete fertilizer or only one ingredient that is made at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. HEFLIN. He will make the completed fertilizer, if you ever turn it over to him.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator any information in regard to that? It is not in his contract. He only agreed to make one ingredient of fertilizer.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; that is in his contract. He says "commercial fertilizer." That means the completed fertilizer. There has never been such a propaganda as is on in the United States between the power companies and the fertilizer companies to kill the Ford offer, and I may as well speak plainly now about this Muscle Shoals proposition. It has to be talked about plainly sooner or later.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think it is fair, in fact I know it to be a misstatement, when the Senator says that Ford in his contract agrees to make a complete fertilizer. He does not agree to do anything of the kind. He is to make nitrate, which is only one of three elements in the complete fertilizer. If the Senator will recall the testimony of Mr. Edison, he will remember that he said that Mr. Ford had a hope that it might be possible to make completed fertilizer by the development of phosphate in the vicinity of the Gorgas plant.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will not the Senator admit that Mr. Ford's contract states that he will make commercial fertilizer?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly, but he specifies——

Mr. HEFLIN. We understand the term "commercial fertilizer" to mean the completed fertilizer.

Mr. McNARY. It is not the completed stuff. The fertilizer he designates is nitrogen, and that is only one of the three elements. Sulphate of ammonium, 110,000, when reduced makes 44,000 of nitrate, which is one element in fertilizer, as against 244,000 tons consumed annually.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my colleague will yield, I think the Senator from Oregon is right as far as the original Ford proposition is concerned——

Mr. McNARY. I am right in regard to the second Ford proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the papers before me, but as I understand it, the House Committee on Military Affairs made a submission to Mr. Ford, which his agent took out to him, and I understand that the amendment proposed before the House Committee on Military Affairs, coming from Mr. Ford, was that he should make a completed fertilizer. I have not that testimony before me, but that is my information in regard to the proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The statement is so often made, which the Senator from Alabama has now repeated, that when it is repeated the next time the farmer is led to believe that Mr. Ford has guaranteed to produce fertilizer at one-half the present cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that Mr. Ford said that.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not say the Senator did say that. I am speaking of the statement of the Senator's colleague [Mr. HEFLIN]. Tracing it down, however, there is no such thing in the contract. Mr. Ford has not made any such proposition. He will not make any such proposition. He is too shrewd a man to do that. No one representing him who can bind him has ever made such a proposition. There is absolutely nothing to that statement. It has not been made. It is not in the bid. It is not in the contract. He hopes to reduce it one-half. Everybody else who is trying to develop Muscle Shoals, whether it is done by the Government or by Mr. Ford or by anybody else, hopes to reduce the cost of fertilizer. That is the reason why we are trying to develop the project. That is the reason why we are together in trying to develop this great power and trying to produce in peace times, by means of what we have there for war times, fertilizer at a reduced price.

I believe that it is coming, whether Ford gets it or anybody else gets it, but nobody knows how. Ford has not agreed to do it. The Government chemists will not agree to do it. They expect to improve the method. We all believe it is going to be done, because it is in its infancy now as to the extraction of nitrogen from the air. But I so often get exasperated at the fact that some one will make a statement like the Senator from Alabama has made, which is technically right. Ford's representative did say they expect to reduce the price of fertilizer. I believe they will be able to do it. It does not mean that Ford must have Muscle Shoals in order to have that done, by any means.

If we did not believe we could reduce the cost of fertilizer, there would not any of us be engaged in the matter. Men who have no interest in the fertilizer proposition, men who have no bias against Mr. Ford or anybody else, are interested only that the American people shall not be deceived. It is like the case where one man said he ate something and vomited something that was black. When the next man told it he said, "My friend vomited something that was black as a crow." The next man who told it said, "My neighbor vomited a crow."

It is not fair to the American people. They do expect, and I believe if Ford gets the Muscle Shoals project that he will reduce the price of fertilizer, but he has not guaranteed to do it. He can not guarantee to do it; neither can anybody else guarantee to do it. His interest in the plant down there is to reduce the cost of fertilizer to the farmer. The bill I have introduced has no guaranty in it. We shall have to spend a lot of money in experimentation. Scientific men who have testified before us say that the field is inviting. There are thousands of men all over the civilized world to-day working on the proposition. We expect to get something out of it, but we might fail.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am going to restate my proposition. Mr. Mayo said that Mr. Ford intended and expected to make fertilizer and to be able to sell it to the farmer at half the price he is paying to-day. That statement is in the hearings, unless it has been changed.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator intimate that anyone would change the hearings except Mr. Mayo himself?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think so. Mr. Mayo has the right to revise his statement. That is the reason why I am backing my recollection of it against the Senator's recollection. That is what Mr. Mayo said.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not contradicted the Senator in that respect.

Mr. HEFLIN. I took down his statement myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit he made a statement similar to that, because he believes it, but that is different from a guaranty.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator's position is perfectly untenable that Mr. Ford ought to put it in a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. Again, Mr. President, the Senator is misrepresenting me. I do not contend that he ought to put it in a contract.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator said he did not put it in a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. He did not put it in a contract, but I do not contend that he ought to do so. I am not finding fault with him because he does not do so. He has too much sense to do it. He is not crazy.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, the Senator is complaining because he did not put it in a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. No; we do not complain because he did not put it in a contract.

Mr. HEFLIN. And yet they say he has too much sense to put it in a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator is again making a misstatement. Nobody has complained because he does not put it in a contract. Mr. Ford has not put it in a contract because no sane man would put it in a contract until he knew how he was going to accomplish it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Of course, Mr. Ford would not put it in the contract that he is going to be able to sell it at half the present price. He purposes to do that. I believe he will do it. Men who spoke for him before the committee said he would do it. We had that in the hearings. Mr. Edison, the great wizard, said there is no doubt about him being able to make cheap fertilizer there.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator from Alabama if he can point to the testimony of Mr. Edison to that effect. Can he call our attention to where he said he believed Ford would be able to do that?

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator remember that testimony?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not remember any such testimony, and I would like to have other members of the committee who are present testify as to whether they heard Mr. Edison say anything of that kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask if the testimony is printed?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is very easy to settle that question by calling attention to the testimony if it is there.

Mr. HEFLIN. Was the Senator from Oregon present when Mr. Edison testified?

Mr. McNARY. I certainly was; and he made the distinct statement, in reply to an interrogatory propounded by the chairman, that he did not want to discuss the Ford proposal at all, that he was not familiar with it, and that he was not there for that purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was it he said——

Mr. McNARY. He was discussing the possibilities of the development of electricity there by way of water power.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was it he said when his man whispered to him that we wanted to know if Ford could make cheap fertilizer, or something to that effect? He said, "There is no doubt about it in the world." Does not the Senator remember that?

Mr. McNARY. I did not hear the whisper, and I am sure it is not in the record of the hearings.

Mr. HEFLIN. He talked loud enough to him because Mr. Edison could not hear us. His man told him what we wanted.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator was sitting nearer to Mr. Edison than I was, but I did not hear it and no one else heard it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I had the question propounded to him myself, and that question is in the record unless it has been changed. I do not know whether Mr. Edison struck it out or not when he revised his remarks, but I do know that the American people have got to know that there has never been such a propaganda carried on as is now being carried on by certain big interests against Henry Ford with reference to the Muscle Shoals project. I have had some queer impressions come to me as I have listened to some of the witnesses pouring out their vials of wrath against Henry Ford because he was about to get hold of and make useful the mightiest water power on the continent when he proposed to take Muscle Shoals and use it for the benefit of millions of farmers in the United States. I have seen these trusts pounce down like vultures, sending their hired agents here, and saying, "Oh, no; there is no such thing as a trust." Did anybody ever hear a burglar say there was such a thing as a burglar? He always denies that there is a burglar. Who is going to take the testimony of a burglar, a man who will break into your house for the purpose of stealing and with murder in his heart, if necessary, if you get in his way? Here they are, moving heaven and earth; and there has never been such propaganda, I repeat, as is going on against Henry Ford.

Now, Mr. President, what do we see? We see the poor farmer—God knows how he has suffered under this administration—down upon his back, and the Fertilizer Trust coming to him and presenting him with a note to sign at 110 per cent, not only mortgaging the crop but mortgaging his farm, mortgaging his stock, turning over to the man who holds the mortgage and the note the right to come and take charge of the crop when he has laid it by and the fruiting time has come, to do anything that he pleases to do with it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am fighting for the great mass of mistreated farmers in the United States and I am hoping that the Senator from Nebraska will join me and battle for them in this as I have seen him battle for them in other things. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator when he read that note, that cutthroat note as it looked to me and as it appealed to me as he read it, failed to read into the record the name of the payee of the note. The Senator ought to do that.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is not in the note.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator ought not to have said what he did. It might be a banker down in the Senator's own town.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no; I said 500 farmers had signed such a note. He said this happened down in that county where the Senator was and where I was at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. NORRIS. But who is the demon who is taking that kind of a note? We have a right to know that when the Senator is making such charges.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is an exposure of the Fertilizer Trust's plan. That is what it is.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator has not read it all, and he ought to be fair enough to the Senate to do that. He ought to let us know who it is that is the payee. Who is it that holds this awful mortgage?

Mr. HEFLIN. There is no name mentioned.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is the mortgagee?

Mr. HEFLIN. No name is mentioned, but I said that 500 farmers had signed such a note. That is what the county agent, Mr. Deal, said.

Mr. NORRIS. Did 500 farmers sign a mortgage without putting in the name of the payee?

Mr. HEFLIN. This is a sample, a blank note. The kind the county agent said was being used this year. But I do know that the farmers of the United States have never been at such a low ebb in morale and everything else as they are to-day. I am pleading for their deliverance from those who pillage and plunder them.

Ford promises to do great things for the farmer.

What did General Gorgas do? General Gorgas went into the swamps and lagoons of New Orleans and said, "Here you are with this pest, the yellow-fever mosquito. The people flee every year when the yellow fever breaks out. I can go in there and drain those swamps, destroy the breeding place of the mosquitoes, and remove the yellow fever forever." Some laughed at him and said, "You can not do it." But he did do it. He did that same thing in the Panama Canal Zone.

I saw Wilbur Wright when he struggled with the forces who were trying to keep him from entering the air with a heavier-than-air machine. They laughed at him and threw obstacles in his way. He said, "I will mount the air and fly with a machine heavier than air, 50 miles, 75 miles, or maybe 100 miles an hour." They said, "He is crazy." I saw him at Fort Myer mount the air and fly like a bird for an hour and 20 minutes and break the world's record in the presence of hundreds of doubting people, who stood by and said just before, "He will never do it." I saw him make good his promise and achieve the thing he started out to achieve.

I saw Henry Ford making an automobile, and he said, "I will make it so cheap that I can put it within the reach of the common man, the man of small means, the plain people." The big automobile men said, "We ought to crush him. He is going to bring down the prices of automobiles. He will force us to sell cheaper and pull down our tremendous profits. He will benefit the masses. He is a demagogue and a dangerous man." I saw Henry Ford accomplish that thing. Now he looks upon the mass of farmers in the United States and says, "The Fertilizer Trust, like a greedy vampire, is sucking their very life blood. I can stop it and will stop it if given a chance. I am going down and take Muscle Shoals, if I can get it. It was abandoned by the Republican Party as junk."

Henry Ford went to Muscle Shoals and he marveled at the possibilities of the project there, and I can imagine hearing him say, "This great river is now singing the song of wasted strength as it winds its way to the sea. I will make it turn the wheels of industry and produce fertilizer so cheap that every farmer can get it in abundance and make the earth blossom as the rose." He went down there and this great wizard Edison went with him. Mr. Edison said, "Mr. Ford will accomplish wonders." He said, "There will be a big industrial city down there." So said the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Ford, the man who has won his spurs in the industrial world, is ready to take it; but what do we find? We find the cohorts who contribute to the campaign fund of the Republican Party trying to kill off the Ford offer—trying hard to keep Ford from getting Muscle Shoals. We might just as well tell the truth about this thing and let the people know what is going on here. I am going to give some of the impressions that have come to me during the hearings on this question before this matter is disposed of. Certain big interests are very active against the Ford offer. I asked some of the witnesses some rather important questions in that hearing; I made some of them admit—and the hearings will show it if they have not stricken out their statements—that they did not want Ford to get Muscle Shoals and become a competitor of theirs.

Oh, Mr. President, I get sick at heart sometimes when I see cruel, grinding processes that deprive men and women of a fair chance in the struggle for existence; processes that cower and crush them. The employment of these inhuman processes by the Republican Party is making Bolshevists out of some of our laboring men; they are making them out of some of our farmers. Farmers that were fairly prosperous a few months ago are now in dire distress. Money and credit have been withheld from the farmers until they were robbed, and now the Fertilizer Trust comes up and demands its pound of flesh from nearest the heart of the farmer. And the powers that be are holding Henry Ford back as he begs for an opportunity to use Muscle Shoals in saving millions of dollars annually to the farmers of the United States.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the eulogy of Mr. Ford by the Senator from Alabama, but I think Mr. Ford wishes to acquire this property not for the purpose of making fertilizer, but in order to produce cheap horsepower to make automobiles and to make more money out of their sale. However, that is aside from the proposition. I want to ask the Senator if, in this whole proposition of Mr. Ford, he can find anything that would prevent this property from falling into the clutches of the Senator's favorite resort, Wall Street, within three months from the acceptance of Mr. Ford's bid?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. It is not in the contract, and it was not in Ben Franklin's contract either, but when he was about to die he put it in his will that the Saturday Evening Post should be sold to future generations for "5 cents the copy," and that has been done. Why can not Ford stipulate as to what disposition shall be made of the property after his death? And I am sure that he will do it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree, referring to the contract, that it does not run to Mr. Ford, but to a corporation, which, upon the death of Mr. Ford, will fall under the control of Wall Street within three days after the funeral of Mr. Ford.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all.
